EXCITING DEBATE IN THE HOUSE.

Threatened Collision Between Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Branch, of North Carolina.

Another Ballot for Speaker.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Thursday, Dec. 29.

The kind feelings which have thus far characterized the proceedings of the House were unexpectedly interrupted this morning by Mr. GROW pronouncing the course of Mr. BRANCH, of North Carolina, in impugning Mr. GROW's motives, as a violation of gentlemanly courtesy. Mr. BRANCH demanded to know if Mr. GROW charged him with conduct unbecoming a gentleman. The latter replied that his language was plain English, and that he had nothing to take back. Mr. BRANCH remarked, "Very well," and resumed his seat evidently much excited. A fight is anticipated, though it is understood that Mr. GROW is a non-combatant. Great excitement prevails in consequence.

The issue between Messrs. BRANCH and GROW has had the effect of harmonizing, in some degree, the Anti-Sherman elements. Several South Americans announced their intention to support a Democrat, and, accordingly, voted for Mr. SCOTT, who was put in nomination as a Northern man; Mr. MAYNARD having, in a handsome manner, withdrawn his name. The Western Democrats held an informal conference this morning, when it was determined to put Mr. SCOTT in nomination, and to ballot steadily for him, at least for a time. Another conference will be held to-morrow morning. The Western Democrats, numbering twenty, have determined to act in concert hereafter, ignoring all Southern and Northern issues. Mr. ENGLISH, of Indiana, may be taken up when Mr. SCOTT is withdrawn. But whoever may be run the result will continue to be the same. There is no possible chance for a successful combination against Mr. SHERMAN, who will eventually be elected, though some of the Republicans think not until after the Charleston Convention, when Senator DOUGLAS will be thrown overboard, and his friends will join their ranks.

The speech of Mr. PRYOR, to-day, is evidently considered by his party friends the great speech of the session. He was frequently interrupted by applause, on the floor and in the galleries, in spite of the efforts of the Clerk to maintain order. After concluding, he was warmly congratulated.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM took occasion to acknowledge his share of the responsibility for the defeat of the Post-office bill, he having voted for Mr. GROW's resolution, which he would do again under like circumstances; but he thought it unmanly in others to dodge their responsibility for the act. Mr. VALLANDIGHAM is a bold, independent statesman of the Randolph order, and one of the ablest men on the floor.

Senator DOUGLAS appeared in the hall again to-day, and was surrounded by the members. He is looking quite well.

Many Senators express the opinion that the Mexican Treaty will be promptly ratified. It is rumored that Senator GWIN will oppose it. Mr. BUCHANAN is sanguine of its approval.

The annual reports of the Cabinet are highly spoken of. It will be seen that Secretary COBB estimates the balance which will be in the Treasury on the 30th of June next, at $13,691,000. The estimates which we published in the TIMES last September fixed the balance at $13,751,000; but the statement was assailed at the time and pronounced unreliable. Q.

[FROM THE REPORTER FOR THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.]

WASHINGTON, Thursday, Dec. 29.

The Secretary of the Treasury has invited proposals, to be received until the 31st of January, for one million one hundred and ten thousand dollars in United States stock, authorized by the act of the 14th of June, 1858; being so much of the stock as has been heretofore awarded to bidders who have failed to deposite the principal and premium on that amount. This stock will be reimbursable in fifteen years from January last, and bear interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually. No bid will be received below par, and none for any fraction of a thousand dollars.

The Court of Claims is obliged to adjourn until next week, owing to the sickness of Judges BLACKFORD and SCAMMON.

The names of the six Southern Oppositionists who to-day voted with the majority of the Democrats for Mr. SCOTT for Speaker, are Messrs. BOCOCK, BOULIGNY, HARDEMAN, MOORE of Kentucky, VANCE and MAYNARD.

Mr. BRANCH will, if he has not already, privately demand of Mr. GROW, in the usual manner, an explanation for the language applied to him to-day in the House. It is probable, however, that by the intervention of friends the cause of offence on each side will be removed, without resorting to extreme measures.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WASHINGTON, Thursday, Dec. 29.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, (Anti-Lecompton Dem.,) concluded his speech, which was begun at the hour of adjournment yesterday. He was demonstrating the propriety of allowing all the people of the Territories to elect their own officers, and to control all their own internal affairs. When Congress shall have settled upon the policy of leaving the Territories to manage themselves, and turned its own attention to National affairs, it will have taken an important step for the preservation of the Union and the perpetuity of its blessings. But the great doctrine of Popular Sovereignty is in peril. The Democratic Party is divided upon it. Some of the Southern Democratic representatives have abandoned it. It is not disputed that the Cincinnati Platform, the only authoritative exposition of the Democratic doctrine, recognizes it, but that seems to make no difference. The President and the ultra Democrats have seized these planks, torn them up, and interpolated new ones, and are driving the Democratic car over the precipice. The Lecompton Constitution inaugurated this suicidal policy at the last Congress Twenty-two Democrats from the Free States planted themselves against it, but were pursued and persecuted as never were men before. They were hunted down socially and politically, especially in Illinois. He would cherish as the proudest recollection of his life his resistance to the infamous Lecompton swindle. Pursued and oppressed by the President with the utmost malignity, and all the power of Federal patronage, it was no wonder that the Party dwindled. As RICHARD the Third cried, "My kingdom for a horse," the President did not scruple to let it be known that he had kingdoms for votes. Under all this pressure the Anti-Lecompton Party dwindled to twelve men—a Spartan band; but the principles which they represent are intrenched in the public heart. But where are the Lecompton men from the Free States who were then in this House? Most of them are buried so deep under the weight of public condemnation that Gabriel's trump can't wake them. They fell before the people like leaves before the wind. In the last Congress there were forty Lecompton Democrats—two from Connecticut, ten from New-York, from New-Jersey two, from Pennsylvania twelve, from Ohio eight, from Indiana five, and from California one. Now we have from New-York four, and all of these from the City; from Pennsylvania two, from Ohio five, according to the best of his information; from Indiana two, and from California two; in all fifteen at most, while there are eighteen Anti-Lecompton Democrats—showing a gain of five or six. Only one Anti-Lecompton-ite was defeated—Mr. MCKIBBEN, of California—who fell gallantly fighting for principle, but was so unfortunate as to live in a Free State, where ultra Southern views prevail, and where the President's patronage is very great. California was the only Free State which passed resolutions directing her Senators to support the miserable Lecompton contrivance. He told the South what the result would be, but they acted exclusively for themselves, without caring for their brethren in the North. Had the South heeded then, they would not now be appealing to the Southern Opposition to help to elect a Speaker. If they are going to persist in the President's policy, the cry might as well go abroad now, "To your tents, O Israel!" Minnesota was lost, and Oregon nearly so by that policy. Even Mr. LANE's popularity can't save Oregon against Popular Sovereignty. Mr. BUCHANAN had put the defeated Lecomptonites in this place and that, but the poor man had too many wounded to take care of all. In California, an honorable Senator was hunted down, even to death, for opposing the President's policy. Almost every Democratic Convention in the North had condemned that policy, but sometimes had been foolish enough at the same time to give a quasi approval of the Administration, and the result was that they were defeated. Judge DOUGLAS alone condemned the Administration, and was triumphantly elected.

Mr. SCOTT, of California, (Dem.,) wanted five minutes to explain the political history of his State.

Mr. MORRIS would only yield to have any statement of fact corrected. California matters were better understood here than the gentleman supposed.

Mr. SCOTT was aware the Black Republicans had put a different color upon the truth.

Mr. MORRIS repeated that DOUGLAS was the only Democrat in the Free States who had succeeded against the Republicans, combined with the unscrupulous cohorts of the Administration—a lean and hungry pack, cheered on by Attorney-General BLACK. He mentioned these facts only to show the effect of the Lecompton issue. He did not want it continued; and had, therefore, voted for Messrs. BOCOCK and HOUSTON. If that issue be persisted in, according to the programme of the President's Message, more terrible disasters must overtake the party in the future. The President's Message would drive the last nail in the coffin of the great Western Democracy. We want to continue to stand with you for the Constitution and Union, and the perpetuity of the Democracy, but we never can do so upon any other doctrine on the subject of Slavery than that of the Cincinnati Platform. There we intend to stand. Towards the Illinois Democracy to this very hour the President had pursued a course of hellish malignity, maintaining a gang of outlaws in office to insult and harass them. In his district a good Kentuckian had been removed from a Post-office to make room for an Abolitionist, because there was no Administration man in the neighborhood. Must we kiss the hand that smites us? Never! never! I never will! The President's adherents are preparing to send a delegation to Charleston, and ISAAC COOK, the Postmaster at Chicago, a man who can scarcely read, and can't spell or write a decent English sentence, a mixture of meanness and mint julep, issued his call, written for him in Washington, for a meeting of his party at Springfield, on January 10, to appoint the delegates. That address was full of absolutism and despotism. The Democracy of the West had no quarrel with the North or the South. The West is connected with both by commerce and consanguinity; is overspread by people of both, and wish to hold both in bonds to keep peace in the Union. He didn't wonder at the Southern indignation at the assaults upon their institution; but the Democracy of the Northwest are not responsible for them. They recognize all Southern rights but that of carrying slaves into Territories under the Constitution, in defiance of the people. They would say to Southern ultras in the Charleston Convention on the 23d of April next, they came from the Free States where the Democratic vote doubled that of the South in 1856; that they met them in all kind brotherly feeling. There should be no crimination, no epithets, no abuse; but at the same time we don't intend to declare in the platform the principles that the Constitution carries Slavery into Territories in defiance of the inhabitants; that it is the duty of Territorial Legislatures to pass laws for or against Slavery if Congress requires it; or of Congress to protect slaves in the Territories by legislation. We don't intend to declare in favor of repealing the laws against the Slave-trade, or the Neutrality laws. But we do intend to declare for the Cincinnati Platform; and we will admit no test except one that will recognize no man as Democrat not in favor of the Union and of fighting his battles inside and not out of it. Not a delegate in that Convention from the Free States, not even from Pennsylvania, will approve the President's doctrine that the Constitution carries Slavery into the Territories. We differ widely but differ as friends. We call upon you to return to your first love, the Cincinnati Platform. We expect you to do it as an act of justice to us. We appeal to your conscience and to your honor.

Mr. MILLSON, of Virginia, (Dem.,) referred to the remarks of Mr. MORRIS, saying the latter seemed to imply that Southern men were in favor of reopening the African Slave-trade and repealing the neutrality laws. He suggested that such might not have been Mr. MORRIS' meaning, and that Mr. MORRIS was not warranted in saying that such was the purpose of the Southern Democrats. He had seen with much regret his own position misrepresented, and the remarks of others attributed to himself. He never remarked that he was not prepared to say that at some time he would not be willing to reopen the African Slave-trade.

Mr. MORRIS replied that he did not attribute such motives to the Democrats of the South, but referred to the ultra men of that section, as well as to the extreme views of the Abolitionists.

Mr. SCOTT, of California, (Dem.,) replied to some of the remarks of Mr. MORRIS, on California affairs, saying that his attack upon the 61,000 Democrats of California came with ill grace from a friend of Mr. DOUGLAS. Had it come from the Republicans he would not have been surprised. He stated that Mr. BRODERICK was never strong enough in California to create any fear or cause any desire to hunt him down. The report that had gone abroad that there was a conspiracy among the leaders of the Democratic Party to strike down Mr. BRODERICK he branded as an infamous falsehood.

Mr. MORRIS knew that the slightest allusion to California would awake sensitiveness. The patronage of the President had been powerful there; but he would not impute corruption to the Lecompton Democrats there. He would let Mr. BRODERICK's friends take care of his memory. No toleration was ever shown by the President to any who differed from his policy. Everywhere they have been hunted down like hares upon the mountain.

Mr. BURCH, of California, (Dem.,) referred to the union of Anti-Lecompton Democrats and Republicans in California.

Mr. MORRIS condemned it, if such were the fact.

Mr. HASKIN, of New-York, (Anti-Lecompton Dem.,) inquired if the California Democracy didn't plant themselves on the Cincinnati Platform, with the interpretation of Mr. DOUGLAS, and of the President's letter, that the people of a Territory, like those of a State, should control their own institutions?

Mr. BURCH said he didn't consider that there was any right in a Territory to exclude Slavery till it comes to form a State Constitution.

Mr. SCOTT—Everywhere on the stump I have proclaimed, along with my hostility to the Slave-trade, that Territorial Legislatures possess no right to exclude Slavery; and that a Southern man has as much right to carry negroes there as a Northern man had to carry other property; and the people had sustained him.

Mr. HASKIN—There you differ from Mr. DOUGLAS.

Mr. SCOTT—Most decidedly, in toto. But I will vote for him cheerfully if he be nominated at Charleston, against a Black Republican.

Mr. MORRIS proceeded: The Western Democracy would say to their ultra Southern brethren at Charleston: "We shall denounce all intervention in your State affairs; we shall fix the seal of disapprobation on the acts of JOHN BROWN and his confederates, as a consequence of Irrepressible Conflict doctrines;" but at the same time we shall blazon all over our banners of living light: "The people of a Territory, like those of a State, shall decide for themselves whether or not they will have Slavery within their limits." Then we shall nominate the right man on the right platform; a man that can be elected—and we have many such—and we shall go on shoulder to shoulder with you into the contest. The American Union has not fulfilled its destiny. If so, it has been indeed an ignus fatuus to the friends of civil and religious liberty—living only long enough to taste its sweet waters, and which have turned to bitterness. Disunion can never come peaceably. It will bring with it darkness and despair; crackling flames of cities, lighting the pathway of death; a land drenched in fraternal blood, and dressed in weeds of mourning. Wo unto us when that day cometh!

Mr. GROW, of Pennsylvania, (Rep.,) replied to some former remarks of Mr. BRANCH, defending his action of last session in connection with the defeat of the Post-office appropriation bill. He contended that according to the Constitutional and parliamentary usages, the Senate had no right to infringe on the prerogative of the House by attaching a provision to raise revenue to the Appropriation bill, and by imposing a direct charge on the people, as was attempted at that time, by an increase in the rates of postage to five and ten cents, and doubling the postage on newspapers. He said that Mr. BRANCH had violated all parliamentary and gentlemanly courtesy, in a deliberative assembly for no member can impeach the motives of another.

Mr. BRANCH, of North Carolina, (Dem.,) (rising)—I want to know whether the gentleman means to impute to me ungentlemanly conduct?

Mr. GROW—I would ask the gentleman to refer to his own language.

Mr. BRANCH—I again ask you whether you impute to me conduct unbecoming a gentlemen?

Mr. GROW—The gentleman said the other day that I wished to defeat the bill in order to induce the President to call an extra session. I say this imputation is not gentlemanly.

Mr. BRANCH—Do you design imputing to me conduct unbecoming a gentleman? Failing to respond, I shall take his silence as an affirmative answer.

Mr. GROW—What I said was in plain English. There it stands. The gentleman impugned my action on the Post-Office Appropriation bill, and everywhere this was thought an infringement of parliamentary law.

Mr. BRANCH—I shall take the gentleman's failure to respond to my inquiry as an affirmative answer.

Mr. GROW—You can take what you please. The gentleman said my object was to kill the bill, and thus compel the President to call an extra Session. I take back nothing I have said. He proceeded to give a history of the defeat of the Post-office Appropriation bills, disclaiming for the Republicans the responsibility of their defeat.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, of Ohio, (Dem.,) said he was one of the twenty-nine Democrats who voted for Mr. GROW's resolution at the last session, and he desired to say a word of explanation. He was of the Horatian School of Philosophy, and adopted the nil admirari policy in politics especially, but he did admire the cool assurance of a gentleman who, responsible to himself for what he calls a great calamity, seeks to place that responsibility where it did not belong? He (VALLANDIGHAM) voted for Mr. GROW's resolution because he doubted the constitutional power of the Senate to raise the rates of postage, and because he was opposed to any increase of those rates. He took upon himself his share of the responsibility, but he should scorn himself if he could seek to place that responsibility upon others. For everything of disaster, distress and embarrassment the seven thousand mail contractors suffered, the gentleman from Pennsylvania was responsible, so far as the defeat of the Post-office Appropriation bill in the House was concerned. And remembering that fact, Mr. VALLANDIGHAM thought propriety would have required the member from Pennsylvania to be silent, or, if not silent, at least to have spoken in tone and language less offensive. He (GROW) with great rudeness and indecorum, told the Democratic side of the House that the New-York Herald had furnished them with brains for their discussions. How easy it would be, Mr. VALLANDIGHAM said, to retort that the New-York Tribune had furnished the Republican side with both brains and decency, and in small and infinitessimal quantities at that, and, moreover, that it was doubtful whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania had received a full share in the distribution. [Laughter.] But I forbear.

Mr. PRYOR, of Virginia, (Administration Dem.,) replied to the remarks of Mr. GROW on a previous day with respect to the delay in effecting the organization. The Democrats were not responsible for the failure to organize upon a conservative basis, but he gloried in the responsibility of preventing an organization on a sectional basis. He denied that the Democrats were responsible for the introduction of the Slavery question. They had only acted the part of him who cries "Fire," when he sees the incendiary torch applied, or who repels the assaults of the robber. The Republicans introduced the Slavery issue when they proposed to elect as Speaker one who had indorsed a treasonable and mischievous book. They applied the torch and then professed to be startled at the explosion. He charged the Republican Party with preaching the most revolutionary doctrines, and then with professing conservatism when they found their intended victims becoming aroused. These hypocritical professions were put forth because they did not intend to flush their game. They were now assuming the livery of heaven to serve the devil in, in order to accomplish their purpose of electing a Speaker, but the South understood perfectly well; all their Pecksniffian prophecies, and Joseph Surface sentimentalities, and would be prepared henceforth and forever. He reviewed the positions advanced by Mr. HICKMAN, denying, in the first place, that the compromises of the Constitution were made for the benefit of the South; and, secondly, that the South had violated one, even the least of them. The South, coming in with every attribute of sovereignty, had a right to insist that every one of her slaves should be represented, instead of submitting to the three-fifths representation, and she had the right to insist upon the perpetuation of the Slave-trade, instead of consenting that it might be abolished in 1808. She had the right to insist on free trade, but had yielded to the principle of the Protective tariff. The gentleman was guilty of a libel upon the people of the South, in charging upon them a violation of the Compromise. It was a notorious fact, that the Slave-trade was prosecuted by Northern men and Northern capital. He had no reverence for legislative compromise. One act of Congress had no more sacredness than another, but he denied that the South had violated the Missouri Compromise of 1820. It was the work of the North.

Mr. HICKMAN, of Pennsylvania, (Anti-Lecompton,) said he was opposed to the repeal of that compromise, and would have voted against the Kansas-Nebraska bill had he been in Congress.

Mr. PRYOR proceeded to show that the South had sought to extend that line, but three times the North refused to extend and perpetuate it. Then the South, considering that restriction to be unconstitutional, and to be used only as an instrument of oppression, did unite for its repeal. He next adverted to the compromise of 1833, in relation to imposts. The South consented to that compromise; but the instant that she began to feel any advantage from it, the North, for the particular benefit of Pennsylvania, imposed upon the South that bill of abominations known as the Tariff act of 1842. The South had been charged with violating the Compromises of 1850. When did the South violate them? Was it when, in 1854, the South yielded Kansas to free labor? But the Anti-Slavery Party of the North were not satisfied with the exclusion of Slavery by the people of the Territories. They wanted an arbitrary exclusion. The Kansas-Nebraska bill would doubtless admit various interpretations, but the South had for her interpretation the authority of the highest judicial tribunal and there was reason to hope that that interpretation would prevail. For one, he protested against making differences of opinion on territorial sovereignty a test of Democracy; and yet he could not consent that the leader of that heresy, who could leave the Democracy in an hour of peril, in the face of the enemy, should hereafter be their chosen leader. He had for the Democracy of the North no word of taunt or reproach, but many words of encouragement and approval. He saw them standing up heroically amid storms of fanaticism, and he denounced the ingratitude of those Southern men who would heap reproaches upon them.

He, too, would write an indictment, not against a whole people, but against the Anti-Slavery Party of the North. The North had extorted from the South the concession of the abolition of the Slave-trade in the District of Columbia. It was an implied compromise of the Constitution that the South should enjoy equal rights in the Territories. Nevertheless, they were threatened by that party with entire exclusion. The rendition of fugitive slaves was a solemnly-expressed compromise of the Constitution; but in eleven States it is nullified, and in many others it is wholly inoperative. Again the Constitution was established for the purpose of insuring domestic tranquility; but they were openly pillaged and plundered, while the Federal Government stood idly by. The South had been loyal to all her engagements, and grudged none of the prosperity of the North. It was a significant declaration on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HICKMAN,) that if the North had it to do over again they would not accept the Constitution.

Mr. HICKMAN said he referred to both the North and the South, and to the present temper of the country.

Mr. PRYOR said it was true the South would not do it over again, because sad experience taught them no faith could be reposed in her confederates. And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had brought this railing accusation against the South, was a moderate man, who had condemned agitation. What was this "irrepressible conflict?" It meant that the Union was rent by two great principles, between which a conflict was going on until one or the other should triumph. These were the opinions of Mr. SEWARD. An apology had been put forth that these were but speculative opinions, which he would not carry into the Executive chair if he were elected President. If that were true, Mr. SEWARD was guilty of the grossest personal perfidy. But when Governor of New-York, Mr. SEWARD, did refuse to execute the Fugitive Slave law. It would be impossible for him, as President, to resist the pressure of Anti-Slavery fanaticism, which would impel him to war against the South. Mr. FILLMORE's course while President had been referred to; but Mr. FILLMORE had no alternative, in face of a Democratic majority in both Houses of Congress, but to act the part of a patriotic President; while, if Mr. SEWARD came into power, Congress would be obedient creatures of his will. He would reorganize the Supreme Court, and there would be nothing between him and absolute dominion.

Mr. HICKMAN said he did not approve the doctrines of Mr. SEWARD, which arrayed one section against the other. He meant to assert that the North is resolute and fixed in its purpose not to permit a dissolution of the Union. The Union must and shall be preserved. [Applause.] Mr. PRYOR was just about saying that the gentleman had imperiously declared they would coerce the South into submission, and had spoken of eighteen millions men against eight millions. He would not retort with defiance, but he would say that the South does not intend to abandon the Union. [Applause.] That was the last resort of despoiled nationalities, who, like the children of Israel in Egypt, do take their household gods with them and depart into the wilderness. The South intended to vindicate her rights in the Union, peaceably if possible, by force if necessary. They would not give up the prestige of legitimate Government, and glorious memories and inspiring traditions of Constitution and Confederacy, and they would not stand alone when they came to scourge and expel the unholy spirits which infested their holy temple. They would have the aid of conservative men at the North; and the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be reversed; the eighteen millions would be on the side of the South, while his band would be reduced to a miserable squad of traitors, who would be crushed between the conjoined efforts of Northern and Southern patriots. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKNIGHT, of Pennsylvania, (Rep.) Mr. PRYOR yielding the floor, referred Mr. PRYOR to a manifesto issued to the country in 1849, drawn up by Mr. CALHOUN, and signed by the members of the Virginia delegation in both Houses, including Mr. BOCOCK, in which this very doctrine of irrepressible conflict is promulgated. His object was to show that Mr. SEWARD had received more honor than was due to him.

Mr. PRYOR (resuming) contended that Slavery afforded the most stable basis of Government, and the highest development of civilization, and denied any logical, inherent, necessary antagonism between the two systems of labor. The interests of the North and of the South were, on the contrary, entirely compatible with each other. The South could produce, and the North could fabricate. The turbulent spirit of free labor at the North would be controlled by the conservative spirit of the South. They had heard of an "irrepressible conflict," but it was an irrepressible conflict between the rights of the South and the interests of the Union on the one hand, and the ideas, principles and purposes of the Black Republican Party on the other. The Anti-Slavery Party were perpetually encroaching like the rising tide, and unless they get above its reach they would all be swept away. The South was fully awake and prepared for the conflict. He appealed to Southern men to set aside trivial party differences, and to unite against the common enemy. The South, when united could await the result in its calm dignity of conscious right. Eight millions of freemen, educated to use arms, animated by valor, and united in the defence of their rights, were not to be subjugated by a miscellaneous mob of brazen fanatics and conscience-stricken traitors; and if need be, it was possible for the South to organize the Government anew, and go on in her career of prosperity and glory.

Mr. MAYNARD said he regarded the support given to him yesterday as an evidence that gentlemen were willing to forget their past political differences for a time, and unite for high and patriotic purposes, rather than a personal compliment. He dared not, therefore, appropriate their action to himself, or even make it the object of his thanks. Apprehending that the further use of his name would fail to concentrate a sufficient number to organize the House on a broad, national and conservative basis, he unconditionally withdrew his name.

Mr. ENGLISH nominated Mr. SCOTT, of California, as a candidate who ought to be satisfactory to every national man.

A vote was taken with the following result:

|---|---|
| Necessary to a choice | 106 |
| Sherman | 102 |
| Scott | 83 |

ISTHMUS OF TEHUANTEPEC.

Capture of the Tehuantepec and Oajaca by Gen. Cobos—Americans preparing to leave.

Correspondence of the New-York Times.

SUCHIL, Monday, Nov. 28, 1859.

The first intelligence from the United States which we have received for three weeks, came today by the mail canoe from Minatitlan. All our letters and papers by the previous mail were, by design, or through the stupidity of the official, carried over to the Pacific side.

The property of the Louisiana Tehuantepec Company was all sold on the 11th inst., and realized (or sold for—it is not yet realized) $18,000. The liabilities are $27,000, which with the expenses of sale deducted, will pay about one-half of the claims, certainly not more. WELSH & ALLEN were the purchasers. The steamer Suchil sold for $10,100. (She has since been lost, and that amount sunk to the creditors.—ED.) The other steamer, the Minatitlan, brought nearly $4,000. Forty days are allowed the purchaser to pay in. On the 12th, COBOS took the City of Tehuantepec, and at last accounts was awaiting reinforcements, before attacking Juchitan, which he no doubt has done before this. He has two thousand troops, three hundred of which are mounted lancers. The Juchitanese are a fighting tribe, and will give him a warm reception. These natives did more fighting during the Americo-Mexican war than any other portion of the Mexican nation of equal numbers. The City of Oajaca is also reported to have fallen into the hands of COBOS. This district contains near thirty thousand inhabitants, and the town is as strongly fortified as any other in the country. Should COBOS march on this place we shall all make tracks down the river, and perhaps seek protection under the stars and stripes on board of some of the mahogany drogers, many of which are now loading at that place. Provisions here are scarce and high. Flour is $20 per barrel, hams 50 cents per pound and other things in proportion. We shoot a pheasant occasionally and have a soup, after which we fall back on the inevitable frijoles and tortillas.

The barks Tully Ho and Linda, both loaded and bound for New-York, got ashore in a heavy Norther, on the 12th, and are abandoned. The vessels have been sold for the benefit of the Underwriters, though, from the prices paid under such circumstances, the "benefit" will be small. The gale has been very heavy all along this coast, and many vessels are reported ashore near Vera Cruz. Some of those wrecked were bound to Minatitlan to load.

The canoe leaves in a few minutes. I will bid you for the present ADIOS.

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.—In the course of its remarks upon the President's Message, the Washington Intelligencer makes the following parenthetic and moving appeal: "By the way, are there not enough independent men in some one of the contending parties in the House who, trusting their constituents to understand and appreciate their motives, will courageously step forth and settle the present unfortunate difficulty, and thus enable Congress to assume its proper functions and proceed with the public business? The dignity of the body, no less than the public interest, is suffering; and if this obstruction is not to continue through the whole Congressional term—which no man dreams of—why not put an end to it at once? Party fidelity is a virtue, doubtless; but, like all other virtues, carried to excess, it becomes a vice."

OVATION TO SENATOR SEWARD.

The Republican Committees at the Astor House—Speech of Ex-Judge Peabody—Reply of Mr. Seward.

he Reception at the City Hall—Immense Concourse of Citizens—Mayor Tiemann's Welcome, and Senator Seward's Response—Departure of the Latter for Auburn.

The national ensign and the banner of the City floated over the City Hall yesterday, in honor of the arrival of the distinguished Senator of New-York, Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, and from the flag-staff of the Astor House, at which Mr. SEWARD was staying, the flag hoisted there on the day of the great Union meeting, inscribed "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable," was still flying.

At 10½ A. M. the members of the two Republican General Committees assembled at the Astor House, in Room No. 41, and there awaited the appearance of Mr. SEWARD. There were many there, too, who were not members of the Committees. Among the distinguished persons present were EX-GOV. KING, EX-Judge PEABODY, JOHN A. KENNEDY, S. B. DUTCHER, Chairman of the Young Men's Republican Committee; Hon. SETH C. HAWLEY, and Supervisors LITTLE and STEWART. At 11 o'clock, Mr. SEWARD entered the room, and was received with vociferous and long-continued cheering, at the subsidence of which,

EX-Judge C. A. PEABODY, formerly Chairman of the Republican Central Committee, addressed him. The feelings, he said, which crowded upon him on the joyful occasion of Mr. SEWARD's safe return, were such that they seemed to repress the remarks that he fain would utter. He had been requested, on behalf of the Republican Committees, to address to him a few words of congratulation upon his arrival at home, and upon the great events which have recently occurred. They would be delighted to give full vent to the sentiments that were uppermost in the hearts of all at this moment, but they were compelled to control themselves, and comply with the rules of propriety which should govern such an occasion. Mr. SEWARD was yet to return to his domestic circle. They knew that it was proper that he should be permitted to go home to his family. They would only detain him to express the happiness that they felt, when they reflected that the sentinels on the watch-tower of Liberty would soon give word to the nation that he had returned to his post. [Applause.] They had parted with him a few weeks ago at the gates of the ocean, when the waves had risen to greet him, and thousands of hearts had wished him a pleasant voyage. He (Judge PEABODY,) would never forget the sensations of that moment of parting. It had produced mingled feelings to which now it was sufficient barely to allude. None of the anxiety then felt was now experienced. They congratulated him, themselves and the country, on his safe return, (applause,) strengthened physically, and with a mind refreshed for the labors that were before him. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SEWARD, in reply, said his memory gave back at once the recollection of every kind salutation and parting word which had been spoken when he had left for Europe. He knew not how much they had to do with procuring him a kind and cordial welcome there. He had had many days of pleasure during the eight months of his absence; but none of them were so pleasant to him as that which brought him home again. [Applause.] He had seen much abroad to appreciate and admire; but he had seen nothing in any of the lands he had visited to equal the prosperity and magnificence of his own native land. [Loud applause.] When he arrived in England, it was known there that he had been there a quarter of a century ago, and he had been frequently asked whether he saw any signs of change and of improvement in the land. It had given him great pleasure to be able to say "Yes." When he had been asked whether there were any changes for the better in his own country, it had delighted him to answer in the affirmative. Twenty-six years years ago, when he left London to return to his own country, he had left behind him a London built of stone, and he had come to a New-York built of brick. Now he had just left London and Paris built of stone, and was returned to a New-York of marble. [Applause.] He was honored by the Common Council of this great Metropolis with the hospitalities of the City. In an hour or two he would be glad to meet all his friends in the City Hall. It would be unbecoming for him at this time and place to dilate on topics of public interest and resume his remarks at another place. He knew they would excuse him from saying anything more until he met them at the City Hall, when he would speak more at large on the sentiments of the time and place.

Mr. SEWARD concluded amid repeated cheers, and after shaking hands with many acquaintances who crowded around him, he retired to his own apartment. There he was immediately waited upon by the Committee of the Common Council appointed to receive him, led by Alderman BRADY, Chairman. The latter informed him that the Common Council extended to him the hospitalities of the City, and Mr. SEWARD expressed his gratification at the honor. Then escorted by the Committee, he entered a carriage drawn by four horses, which was waiting for him and proceeded to the City Hall.

PROCEEDINGS AT THE CITY HALL.

Long before the arrival of Mr. SEWARD at the City Hall, the crowd collected in the various passages leading to the chamber of the Board of Aldermen, so that it was only with the greatest difficulty that the file of sturdy policemen could clear a passage for the distinguished guest. Almost every man near the door announced himself as a reporter, with the hope of gaining speedy admission, and had it not been for the presence of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Board of Aldermen—Mr. GALLAGHER—the bona fide members of the craft would have fared ill enough. After the first rush, however, the doors were guarded stoutly, and closed when the room had become comfortably filled. Mayor TIEMANN then welcomed Mr. SEWARD in the following address:

MAYOR TIEMANN'S SPEECH.

Mayor TIEMANN said: I am delegated by the Common Council of the City of New-York to the pleasing duty of welcoming you back to your native State. You have a great many ardent friends that are desirous of seeing you, and for that reason the Common Council has tendered you the use of this room for the purpose of seeing those friends. I, individually, am happy to see you back; I hope your trip has been conducive to your health, and prepared you for the arduous duties through which you are to pass.

When the applause that followed the Mayor's welcome had subsided, Mr. SEWARD spoke as follows:

SPEECH OF MR SEWARD AT THE CITY HALL.

Mr. SEWARD said: I do not mean to yield to the impulses of feeling on this occasion, although I can scarcely conceive what could be more flattering to me than this generous reception in the metropolis of my native country, and under the auspices of the constituted authorities of the City; nevertheless, I am sure that any seeming insensibility to this cordial welcome would not only convict me of caprice, but would argue me ungrateful to the Divine goodness that permits me to enter again, after a long absence, unbroken circles of true patriots, affectionate kindred, and life-tried friends. [Applause.] Inquiries have been addressed on all sides and by all parties. I hope that those now listening to me are aware that I must be impatient to reach once more, and as soon as possible, my yet distant fireside, and therefore I am sure that you will be content to receive very brief answers—at least on the present occasion—to those kind inquiries. I have, Mr. Mayor, met with no accident by land or by water. With no serious hindrance in my way I have enjoyed good health in every season and in every clime. I have met no unkindness anywhere, but, on the contrary, the respect every where entertained for my country has procured for me among all classes and conditions of men hospitalities which I shall remember with gratitude so long as I shall live. [Applause.] Mr. Mayor and fellow-citizens, in those Eastern regions, from which we derive our revelations of Divine truth, paralysis, which seems as if it were to be eternal, rests upon society, and leaves little else to be studied there than the sublime and affecting monuments which authenticate the evidences of our faith. [Applause.] I have been able, in many instances, to compare the existing conditions of society in European States with that existing there twenty-five years ago, when I had the fortune to visit the Eastern Continent. I think I can safely say that all the nations on that continent have more prosperity than they ever have heretofore enjoyed, and are making decided progress in moral and material improvement. At the same time, it is most manifest that the institutions of government existing there which either are ancient, or founded and constructed on ancient principles, are not adapted to the exigencies and sentiments of the present day, and therefore it is that every country in Europe—the whole of Europe—seems to be at this moment balancing between the desire for beneficial change and the fear of dangerous innovation. Our political system, constructed at a later period and under better auspices, seems to be adapted to all the changes of national life, and to leave us, therefore, happily, free alike from the need and from fear of organic change. It must always be difficult to determine how far we can lend encouragement to those who seek to reform the political institutions of their countries, even with the hope of benefit to them. But, Mr. Mayor and fellow-citizens, this, at least, we can always do—we can endeavor to conduct our internal affairs, as well as our foreign relations, with true candor, and justice, and moderation, and so commend our better system of Government to the adoption of all nations, by proving that that system is founded in public virtue, and that we are "as a city that is at unity with itself," while it seeks only by pacific and lawful means to promote the peace, prosperity, and welfare, and happiness, and civilization of mankind. [Applause.]

The speech concluded, the people pressed forward to shake Mr. SEWARD by the hand. Mr. SEWARD stood in front of the Clerk's desk, with Mayor TIEMANN on one side and Alderman BRADY on the other, and returned the salutations of all very cordially. Some were content to hold his palm in theirs for a moment and then pass on, but many had their little speeches prepared for him and delivered them, with the degree of gravity and emphasis which accorded with the taste of each, as they took him by the hand. "So much happier to see you at the White House," said one, with a smile of deep significance. "This is a much safer place than that," replied Mr. SEWARD. Mr. WM. CURTIS NOYES, in passing, said, "We have a specimen of this irrepressible conflict getting in here." Alderman TUOMEY was introduced. "He," said Alderman BRADY, "voted to extend the hospitalities of the City to you." "It will never be any reproach to him," said Mr. SEWARD. "Take good care of us down there, (pointing southward,) Governor," said one of the people. "I hope you've come home loyal to the Union," said another. "If it don't fall," replied Mr. SEWARD, "before I take it to pieces, it will be apt to stand, a very durable piece of handiwork." "I want you for next President of the United States," whispered a little man in a confidential tone. Another repeated for the hundredth time, "There's an irrepressible conflict going on outside." "I hope you'll be able to reduce it," Mr. SEWARD answered. The next loquacious individual that passed by was a short, stout, evidently important personage, who, standing on tip toe, shouted in Mr. SEWARD's ear, "I hope you'll fulfill your mission!" Another placed his hand on the head of the Senator, said solemnly, "God Almighty bless you!" and suddenly departed. "Been at several President's receptions," remarked a gentleman of Hibernian visage, "and never saw the likes of this." To Gen. F. A. TALLMADGE, Mr. SEWARD said, "How is my old friend and fellow-laborer?" And when Gen. TALLMADGE asked whether he left for home that day, Mr. SEWARD replied, "Yes, there's a very respectable woman waiting to see me 300 miles from here." "Can't I go for you?" asked Gen. TALLMADGE. "No, I thank you," returned Mr. SEWARD, laughing. "Governor," said an acquaintance of Mr.

SCIENTIFIC NOTES.

Machine Tools—Their Relation to all Manufactures—Extreme Accuracy of Workmanship—Variety of Adaptations—Prominence of Philadelphia Tools.

There is probably no important manufacture which attracts so little popular attention as that of machine tools, and yet there is none whose perfection is so essential to all manufacturing success; it is the very mother of the mechanic arts. The steam-engine, with its many adaptations and brilliant achievements; the complicated organs and movements of cotton and woolen machinery; the almost human motions of the pin-machine; and the quick and sure manipulations of a thousand iron hands which turn out our food, raiment, and comforts before our wondering eyes—all these are the theme of daily admiration. But the dingy, plodding, unostentatious lathe and planer, as they whittle down the uncouth masses, with monotonous repetitions, a shaving at a time, at snails' pace, are passed by unobserved. Yet a locomotive which can run at 40 miles an hour, may be a bungler's job by the side of a simple tool which can make a piece of iron so nearly round or so nearly sqare that no inaccuracy can be detected. The economy and durability, however, of the locomotive, and of all machines, are to a great extent decided by the tools by which they were shaped. Good fits is the watchword in all branches of mechanical engineering, and the thing made is the best test of the thing that makes it.

Till within a few years manufacturers and machinists have shared the popular error on this point. All machine-manufacturers have been an approximation to the "rule of thumb." "Cut and try" has been the formula; the idea of paying high prices for accurate tools is even now scouted by two opposite classes among us—first, counting-room engineers, who expect a new dollar for an old one the same day; and, second, mechanical geniuses who can accomplish all things with a cold-chisel and a file. The great mass of manufacturers, however, are beginning to embody in practice the belief that it is cheaper to design a thing on paper than in metal—that it is cheaper to make all parts fit, even to the fraction of a hair, the first time they come together, than to chip and file away the inaccuracies left by cheap tools; that strong, heavy tools will do twice the amount of work possible for weak and light ones; that special tools, adapted to all the different requirements of machine-making, are, for all the above reasons, a better investment than any amount of slower and less accurate hand-work—in short, that the best possible machine tools, which will do any given thing ten thousand times alike and correctly, are absolutely necessary to the economy of producing a given machine, and to the economy of its production, down to untold generations of tools and machinery.

Machine tools, as is well known, are employed solely to finish the surfaces of rough metallic parts, and fit them to each other. The leading classes of tools are, the lathe, the planer, and the boring-machine. Each class has its varieties of special and adaptable tools; among the lathes are those for all sizes and varieties of straight cylindrical work only, those for screw-cutting only, those for cutting off the ends of shafting and centering it, and those for turning cones at certain fixed angles; and there are tools which do all these, and may be made into drilling and boring engines besides. Among the planers are those for straight work only, also the varieties of shaping and slotting machines. Among the drills are those for boring small and portable parts, also the more complicated kinds for boring all sorts of holes at different angles in large immovable parts—the boring tool itself assuming the desired positions, but always with a hair-splitting accuracy of adjustment. Among the boring tools (which are really lathes for turning the insides of cylinders, drills not being sufficiently accurate for large holes,) are those for car-wheels only, and those for other special varieties of work. In the manufacture of arms especially, these three classes of tools have been divided into several hundred special tools, each adapted to one thing only. The economy of such adaptations in large manufactures is evident. To run all the machinery of a great shafting or pulley lathe to bore a small hole, and to run a bed piece planer to trim off a bolt head, is wearing out machinery for nothing; but worse than this, it is consuming twice or thrice the necessary time. One good lathe may answer all the purposes of a small machinist, but in large railroad shops, and in general manufactures, the cost of special tools is found to be highly economical of money and time.

The fitting of metallic surfaces in such a manner that there is no appreciable space between the joints, especially in complicated and adjustable machinery, and to do all this the first time, and thousands of times alike, and always with the rapidity which will insure commereial success, and when the tool must be in every part adapted to the various sizes of work, and to the varying speeds and depths of cut required by different sizes and metals, the problem is evidently of no easy solution. The cutting of screws in a lathe, with various threads, diameters and pitches, involves a large amount of practical mathematics as well as the most accurate workmanship, and the cutting of gearing embodies some of the highest principles of geometry, each part of each tooth being not "rounded off," but cut to an epi-cycloidal curve. Machine tools must, therefore, embody three prominent features: 1. Great strength and weight, for these alone secure that rigid inflexibility which permit accurate movement, and they are absolutely essential to quick work. A slight quivering lathe may turn out a round shaft in time, by a light cut and slow feed, but commercially it is of no account—to cram work through a lathe and have every product accurate, requires the solidity of a rock in each part. 2. Clumsiness, the natural accompaniment of solidity, in green hands, must be especially avoided. The greatest facility for adjusting work is very essential. Hence, not only the best materials but the most accurate conformity to the laws of the strength of materials is necessary. To calculate all the strains and to meet them, without wasting metal where there is no strain, is one of the highest offices of engineering, and the one wherein most mechanical and engineering works are defective. Strict conformity to these laws gives also the finest proportions in an æsthetical point of view. 3. Accurate fits in tools themselves decide the accurate fits of everything made by them, and a defect in the tools never ceases reproducing itself. The use of the best materials is, in this regard, of the greatest moment. Not only rubbing, but fixed surfaces must fit, for any "give" or looseness in the bolts which hold a tool together are sure to become exaggerated by use, and will ultimately throw everything out of line.

These principles distinguish the Philadelphia machine tools. The establishments of Messrs. WILLIAM SELLERS & Co. and Messrs. BEMEN & DOUGHERTY are distinguished not only in this country, but all over the world, for the excellence and variety of their work. France, Austria and Russia are their constant customers; the Government works in New-York and in other cities are supplied from these works, and the better class of railroad and machine shops are adopting this make of machinery. There are some establishments in New-York and New-England where the best kind of work is done, but they are generally engaged in the manufacture of special tools. For general machine tools, however, so long and well established are the Philadelphia houses, that the term Philadelphia Tools has become a special recommendation and advertisement in behalf of the users of them. However loudly the builders of tools all over the country may advocate their own work on the score of cheapness, we have never heard of one who doubted the excellence of those made by the establishments named. Whether or not the best is the cheapest in the end, will be practically an open question, we fear, for some time to come.

The machine tools of twenty years ago, were very rough affairs, with their warping wooden frames and jerking chain feed. Iron frames of light proportions were gradually introduced, and many improvements in adjustability gradually grew up with the demand for a better class of steam and general machinery. Mr. WHITWORTH, of Manchester, England, the celebrated tool builder and reformer, inaugurated great improvements by introducing standard gauges for screw threads and other parts, by which not only each manufacturer could fit his own work, but by which certain standard parts all over the world might be uniform. These gauges are of course more accurate than any possible measurements by rule—being fitted to the ten-thousandth part of an inch—and are adopted by all the best shops in all countries. Mr. WHITWORTH further improved machine-tools by perfecting their proportions, solidity and accuracy. The labors of the Philadelphia tool-builders were cotemporaneous, and the results similar to those abroad, while many features in both countries have been interchanged. Mr. WHITWORTH remarked, when in this country, that the tools of Messrs. WILLIAM SELLERS & Co. were equal to his own. As to the merits of the two Philadelphia establishments, no general distinction can be drawn. In certain special tools each has its peculiar advantages. Both use the best and most expensive materials, such as cast iron which is of a tensile strength of 22,000 to 28,000 lbs. per square inch, gun-metal of nine parts copper and one part tin, for boxes, and cast steel costing 16 cents per pound, forged to shape in Sheffield, for spindles, &c.; the wearing surfaces, after planing, are scraped together, and bolts do not slide loosely, but are turned and driven into reamed holes. Cone pulleys are accurately turned on the inside, to balance. One of the large lathes of Messrs. BEMENT & DOUGHERTY in the Camden and Amboy Railroad shops, has turned off four flanged driving-wheel tires in six and one-half hours—two days' work for some machinery we have seen. One of the peculiar features of the work of this house, is the use of hollow or box pedestals or posts instead of the ordinary solid legs. Thus, not only is the metal more strongly disposed, none of it being in the "neutral axis," where it does no work, but the hollow box forms closets, with shelves and doors, for the convenient and safe storing of the taps, dies, chisels, cutters and small accessories of a large tool. In these works is probably the largest planer in this country. It can take in a mass 45 feet long, 10 feet wide and 8 feet high, planing it in three places at once.

A new and very important tool has just been built by Messrs. BEMENT & DOUGHERTY, called a cotter-drill, for planing slots or key seats. A drill not only revolves, but moves back and forth, thus making a mortice of any length or depth at one operation. Machines for this purpose have been for some time used in England. This has improved upon the old plan by substituting the screw instead of the crank for the longitudinal movement of the drill, thus giving a truly uniform motion. It also employs two drills, one on each side, for making slots, thus saving half the usual time. Many of its adjustments are novel and remarkable. The machine is about 6 feet long, 3 feet high and 3 wide, and will cut slots from ¼ inch to 30 inches long, and hold a piece of metal 10 inches wide. Its cost is $700. It will do the work of six men, more accurately than a man can do it in any amount of time.

Messrs. WILLIAM SELLERS & Co. have also introduced an improved and very important tool—a bolt-cutter, for making the threads on bolts quickly and accurately. There are three ways of doing this work. The bolt itself may revolve and screw into stationary dies, while it is cut by the dies. In case of very long bridge bolts this is inconvenient, as the bolt, not being perfectly round and true, will jump about; or the dies may revolve, the bolt being fixed; but in case of solid dies, after they have screwed upon the bolt, in the process of cutting it, they must be unscrewed again, which necessitates the reversing of the motion, and consumes twice the time absolutely required to do the work. In this new machine, however, the die is in three pieces which open and shut while revolving, so that when they have drawn in the bolt in the process of cutting it, they are opened by the movement of a lever, so that the bolt may be instantly withdrawn, the dies revolving as before, and being all ready for the next bolt. The manner in which this is done, though very simple in actual parts, can hardly be described in our limited space. It is accomplished by the varying motions of two wheels driven from the same shaft, the one moving the box which holds and rotates the dies, and the other moving sections of eccentrics which open and close the dies. When cutting they both move together. The machine is very small, simple and substantial in appearance, and will accomplish about twice the work of the ordinary bolt-cutter. Its cost, with all appurtenances, is $300. The turn-tables for locomotives, and other railroad machines built at this shop, are worthy of the special attention of those who have at last determined to reduce expenses by using good tools.

A PREVAILING MALADY.

What Causes Dyspepsia—and How it may be Cured.

Were it asked what disease is the most prevalent in the world, a throng of emaciated faces would answer, Dyspepsia. You meet it everywhere, as far as civilization extends; indeed, it may be called the creature of civilization. It is one of the greatest of human afflictions,—bearing directly upon the physical, and complicating the mental and moral condition of mankind, and affecting seriously the affairs of life.

Without enumerating all the minutiæ, I shall note the more prominent, recognized points of the subject, and add such other matter connected with it, but less generally known, as may be deemed worthy of attention.

Properly speaking, dyspepsia is not a disease, though treated as such. It exists, eminently in a varied degree, ranging from a temporary ailment, to a protracted, exhaustive disease, unfitting the individual for business or pleasure—a burden to himself, fit neither for life nor death. To this unenviable state is to be added the reproach which attaches to those cursed with this malady. It is thought to argue sensual indulgences—a lack of moral energy in the individual. This, in the main, is unjust, as will be seen when we enumerate the causes which lead to the disease. These are various and often unsuspected. I will name the most prominent.

Chief is a sedentary life. Man is so constituted by habit, that exercise is made a necessity to health. It is a normal condition. A deviation from it is an infringement of the sanitary laws of man's nature. The fluids of the body not having their accustomed stimulus which exercise imparts, lose their balance in the system. The agent that sends the blood to the extremities and the skin, being withheld, an internal concentration of fluids takes place, depriving the rest of the body of its due share of the circulation. Among the many laws of our nature, there are certain which require our obedience—effort on our part. One is the necessity of exercise. We must act, or suffer the result. The natural state of man is not indolence; hence the odium attached to a life of idleness.

The next thing that most induces the disease, is excessive indulgence of the appetite. We not only take too much food in the aggregate, but we overload the stomach, distending that member till its strength becomes lessened and its functions deranged, the whole system sympathizing with this central, most critical and important organ.

The intemperate use of ardent spirits is another source of dyspepsia. It is also brought on by undue muscular exertion. This is less generally known as a cause of dyspepsia, and its philosophy still less understood. The fatigue which the muscles undergo, extends to the stomach as well, which, in consequence, loses its energy—thus unfitting it, as well as the other digestive organs, for its requisite performances. The inference is, there is not sufficient digestive and assimilative power to sustain the system. Besides, if persisted in, the functions of these organs become not only weakned, but constitutionally deranged, which is a further complication of the difficulty—

[illegible] does the patient so generally [illegible] easily become a delinquent. Ease not only, but weakness, and an indisposition to act, cause this dereliction. Not only is the inclination lasting, but the will, the power to do. We are, therefore, not surprised at neglect in this important particular.

Let me also again warn the individual against the tendency of feigning himself afflicted with other and dangerous diseases. It is difficult—almost impossible—to successfully combat these morbid insinuations. Unless the patient succeeds in arresting this tendency, he will seem in turn to be attacked by almost every malady, and suffer the consequent effect of such imaginings, heightened by the already existent gloom of the mind. Hence the necessity of another's aid to enforce these observances.

ing dyspepsia, which always means, [illegible] brought about, a derangement of the organs of digestion, principally the stomach,

I have thus enumerated the more prominent inducements which lead to this disease. There are others, but they are generally auxiliary to the main causes—such as severe mental exertion, persisted in; strong emotions of whatever kind, often indulged in, and long-continued. To name all the symptoms of dyspepsia—and their name is legion—is not necessary. I will mention some, in the hope, more particularly, to relieve those who may be under the harrowing impression that some other and fatal malady is preying upon them,—which in itself may be set down as a symptom of the disease.

A gloomy atmosphere is the inheritance of the dyspeptic, with now and then sharp glances of sunlight, both the gloom and the light unnatural—the former weighing down the spirits to a morbid degree, the latter elevating them to a feverish excitement. This is not the worst phase of the disease: that takes place when all is gloom, and no bright moments enliven the horizon. Hence, to the confirmed dyspeptic, life is a dreary existence. He sees things in a false light, his impressions are erroneous, his judgment, in consequence, becomes unreliable. His bright moments—which eventually return—reveal this, which adds another pang to the many that annoy him, as it touches his character for sanity. All this, as before stated, leads to the worst evil that results from dyspepsia—imaginary misfortune—appearing in as many forms almost as the subject of the patient's thoughts.

Physically he has many evils to contend with; pain in the chest, and other parts of the body, particularly the left side and the sternum. The muscles of the body become weak and flabby, manifesting soreness on the least unusual exertion, with lameness in the limbs, &c. There is tenderness in the region of the stomach and the hips, felt upon pressure. The extremities are cold and rigid; the skin dry, rough and pale; hands and feet especially are cold, sometimes hot and burning. The patient at times is distressed with night-sweats, bad sleep, and worse dreams. He seems heir to a thousand evils, changing in their nature,—old ones vanishing, new ones appearing. Some of the most alarming to the sufferers, are palpitation, cough. He is troubled with vertigo, ringing and other sounds in the ears. Sometimes he hesitates in his speech,—has uncertain action,—is pleased with nothing,—pleases nobody,—has abundant occasion for regretting blunders of manners and morals. Moral power he seems greatly to lack: he has lost self-control, follows this whim and that, but never the doctor's prescription to the end—he cannot remain in the mood long enough. Hence the disease is prolonged, especially as time is necessary to a cure. He has no patience for that, he is so moody, so wavering. In a word, he is only the shadow of himself.

But, happily, dyspepsia is a curable disease. The cure rests in the observance of three prominent requirements, namely: the removal of the cause, diet, and exercise. These may be aided by other means,—but, alone, they are sufficient to cure the disease.

Intemperance, in its widest sense, is the true cause of dyspepsia—excesses of all kinds that bear upon the stomach, as already remarked. Correct these, and you will remove the gyves that bind down the recuperative energy. This done—which meets the first requirement—the system, which is in a debilitated condition, needs aid, needs nursing.

Experience shows that a given quantity of food can be more easily digested in four than in three meals—it shows that quantity is of more importance than quality. The patient in general will be his own best judge in what agrees best with him. He should avoid all excitement immediately before and after, as well as during his meals, which should be enjoyed at his leisure, that the appetite may appreciate the measure of food, and time be afforded for its thorough mastication. Rest,—or better, a mild passive exercise,—should follow each meal. It is also important to keep regular hours. Food taken at unusual seasons produces headache, and temporary disorder of the digestive process. Most of all, avoid a surfeit.

In general, tea may be indulged in to some extent. Coffee should be avoided, or taken sparingly. If used occasionally, it may serve to stir up the dormant energies, and in a measure prove a revulsive agent. It is best, perhaps, to avoid entirely tobacco and ardent spirits—the latter gradually, where habits of intemperance exist. In no case should strong habits be broken up abruptly, as the system can ill endure the shock, as well as shocks of any kind: hence the cold bath should generally be avoided.

With regard to the third and last, but equally important point—exercise—a wide field is open. Perhaps the best exercise is in the saddle. It effects equally the whole system. The patient acts in his effort to retain his position, and is acted upon by the motion of the horse. The internal organs, as well as the limbs and muscles of the body, receive the invigorating benefit.

Walking is the most ready mode of exercise; but many others, the writer is convinced from experience and observation, are preferable, because in walking the legs and back are taxed disproportionately to the rest of the body.

It is most important that exercise be regular and continued, as well as equally affecting all parts of the body. Several hours in each day, at least, should be devoted to it—devoted to thorough action, short only of great fatigue.

A conformity to only one, or even two, of the three general requirements, will not cure dyspepsia. It requires a faithful observance of them all to remove what even then will be found most discouragingly persistent. As the disease is not formed in a day, so it cannot be cured in a day.

There are other things to be observed. The hours of sleep should be held sacred against intrusion. It is important that the patient have some employment or recreation to occupy his time, which would otherwise make him a prey to gloomy thoughts, and aggravate his distress. Traveling agreeably diverts the attention. Any change which occupies the mind is beneficial, especially if it affords exercise to the body, which, as much as possible, should be made a pleasure instead of a task. This may seem unimportant, but is really a matter of consequence. Cheerfulness is an efficient medicine, though its extreme, hilarity, is too great a strain upon the nerves, which, in dyspepsia, are very weak. Great heat and cold should be avoided; the one enervates, the other unduly taxes the system;—intense cold is too great a stimulant. Extremes should always be avoided, and moderation be the watchword.

In general, medicines are of little avail, and then only as aids. The bowels may be regulated by a judicious diet, embracing the aperient fruits, or food containing astringent properties where a relaxing agent is required, though in the great majority of cases, costiveness is the rule. This may be best treated by a resort to regular stool hours. The patient should have a stated time in each day which should be inflexibly adhered to. Only urgent or obstinate symptoms should call in the aid of the physician.

One of the greatest difficulties in the cure of dyspepsia, is a lack of moral power—energy to overcome, to persist, resolutely, unflinchingly, in the course prescribed. The patient will be led into excesses almost ere he is aware, and sometimes under the impression that he is sufficiently recovered to indulge his appetite without danger. Nothing can be more delusive. Dyspepsia is the most fickle of diseases; a strong hand and a firm mind alone can carry out what will eventually insure success, namely, an unremitting course of treatment,—and this should fall upon another, not upon the patient—at least, not exclusively; as well leave the inebriate with his cups. It is this persistence in the treatment that is so generally neglected; and without its observance, not a case of dyspepsia can ever be cured.

In conclusion, let me once more refer to exercise. Too much stress can hardly be put upon this

Brevet Rank in the Navy.

There is a very remarkable discrepancy between the Army and Navy of the United States in their prospect for the recognition of extraordinary merit, or the reward for distinguished and brilliant professional achievements, by the General Government. The soldier is sure of his honorable promotion on the slightest pretext, or even upon none at all; whereas the sailor may be a perfect NELSON, and will still find that virtue is not only its best, but its only reward. There is no doubt, however, that the love of commendation and the hope of promotion are the most powerful incentives, in the present deplorable condition of humanity, to produce those displays of individual daring and gallantry which constitute the brightest pages in the military history of any country; and, in all services whose rules will admit of discrimination in this matter, this motive is not only recognized, but encouraged. But the Navy of the United States has, (if not by regulation, at least by custom,) with scarcely an exception, been regulated hitherto, in the promotion of its officers, entirely by seniority.

It is, doubtless, true that the disadvantages of this system of promotion by seniority are fewer and more reconcilable to our republican notions than those of any other, and but very few cases can arise, even in time of war, where it would be either wise or expedient to depart from it, so far as the regular promotions are concerned; but the hope of a purely honorary advancement, that should carry with it neither authority nor pay, would at all times be found a powerful incentive to exertions for individual professional distinction.

It is barely possible that civilians, with all the splendid realities and possibilities within their reach, may think this empty rank to be simply ridiculous, and the character that could find gratification in such a reward to be weak and puerile, although their eagerness for militia titles may seem to contradict such a supposition; but, in reality, it is only as a mark of the nation's approval that this brevet-rank would be sought after and prized by officers of the Navy. In short, it would answer precisely the same purpose as the bestowal of medals, decorations, crosses of the Legion of Honor, peerages, and all the other incentives to extraordinary exertion that are so successfully employed by the Governments of Europe—only the means would be legitimate, professional and consistent with our Republicanism. Granting, however, that the desire of a merely nominal promotion is foolish, it is, at worst, an amiable weakness, and has the further recommendation of affording an effective and cheap mode of rewarding important and glorious services. It would be unwise in the country to neglect so great a stimulus to the zeal and gallantry of its officers, from any overstrained notions of what would constitute a proper dignity in them. No father finds fault with his child for preferring sugar-plums to cigars and grog; but wisely and joyfully encourages obedience and good behavior, with the more appropriate and less expensive means at his disposal. It should never be forgotten that the object of any military organization is to enable the country to maintain its rights and honor by fighting, whenever these cannot be secured otherwise; and if men can be induced to fight better by such simple appeals to a quality of human nature so universal as the love of approbation, the folly and puerility would surely be in neglecting such means. That such appeals are effective in exciting the daring gallantry and tough obstinacy which produce great military results from individual heroism, needs no labored argument to prove. Every military man knows and feels it, and the history of all times is proof sufficient for other people.

The objections that might be raised to the introduction of brevet ranks into the Navy by the officers themselves, would be of a different character. The needy and greedy among them might, perhaps prefer an increase of pay to an increase of rank; but, surely, such ignoble desires would find but little sympathy, either in the service or out of it. The principal opposition to the measure would come from the Captains, who, being already in the highest grade recognized in our service, would have nothing to expect from it, and would naturally be unwilling to see their juniors breveted to the same rank with themselves; but if the real wants of the Navy were satisfied by creating a list of Admirals, (to consist, for example, of one Admiral, seven Vice-Admirals, and fourteen Rear-Admirals,) the remaining sixty Captains—and, indeed, the lower grades of Admirals themselves—would instantly become as warm in their advocacy of brevet ranks as the youngest Midshipman in the service. Again, if it be alleged that prejudice to the service would arise, in practice, from a confusion of uniforms and their attendant duties, that objection might easily be obviated by designating the brevet rank only in the epaulet and shoulder-strap, and leaving the badge of lineal rank unchanged on the wrist. As for the objection (if it be urged) that brevets were rendered worthless in the Army by a wholesale and indiscriminate abuse of them, surely that is no argument against their legitimate use; and the hope of winning them still remains as great an incentive to exertion as ever.

It only remains, therefore, to consider whether the establishment of brevet ranks, as recognized in the Army, would prove to be applicable to the Navy; and upon this point there can be but one opinion. The Army practice, with its numerous and frequent involutions and inversions of relative ranks, determined as they are by slight differences of circumstances, would be a curse rather than a blessing to the Navy. The great and all-important change that should be made in adapting it to the sea-service, should be to deprive it entirely of all mere accidental exercise. Nothing whatever but the express, direct and personal action of the President of the United States should confer upon an officer the exercise of his brevet-rank, with its corresponding authority and pay. Separate services, courts-martial, temporary or accidental command, and every other contingency which, in the Army, renders brevet-rank operative, should expressly be made of no effect in the Navy. This rank should be considered as purely of an honorary character, and simply as a means of enabling the country, through the Executive and Senate, to acknowledge distinguished merit—although, at the same time, it might, on rare occasions, enable the President to give the benefit of extraordinary abilities or attainments to any special or peculiar enterprise, when otherwise it could not be done.

Terrible Suffering at Sea.

PASSAGE OF THE CALIFORNIA CLIPPER CHERUBIM

From the San Francisco Bulletin.

The magnificent ship Cherubim, of Baltimore, which now lies at the Market-street wharf discharging her cargo, arrived at this port on the 19th ult. For many weeks previous to her arrival, much anxiety had been felt for her fate, as she left New-York early last Spring. As she was known to be a fast sailer and a staunch vessel, the probabilities were even stronger that she had been utterly lost. From her first officer we have gathered the story of her long detention out, and it is a hard one. The Cherubim left New-York on the 9th of May; it was 193 days afterwards that she entered our harbor. But when she did arrive, she came in perfect order and in capital condition. She seems to have suffered all the nautical troubles that could possibly crowded inside of 193 days. She was 46 days drifting through calms and beating against light headwinds, before she reached the equator on the other side.

On the morning of the 25th of August, while things were at the worst off the Cape, and there were some two feet of water rolling across the main deck, it was found that the top of the pipe leading down to the water-tank, in which the whole water supply is kept, was gone. The salt water, of course, poured down into the tank, and the 40,000 gallons upon which they had confidently relied was every drop of it ruined. It was impossible that this could be the result of an accident. The pipe was plugged up tightly at once, and a piece of canvas nailed over it. Next morning, plug and canvas were both gone. Who perpetrated the villainy it was never discovered, but his object was readily surmised. Some poor fellow, in his despair, hoped, by spoiling the water, to compel the ship to put back. Providentially, a single cask on deck, as provision against accident, had been filled just before the mishap. All hands, officers, men and passengers, among whom were Capt. SKINNER's wife and children, were put upon allowance of a pint a day, from that time till the arrival at Valparaiso, 35 days afterwards. Of provisions there was an abundance, the ship having taken a year's supply at New-York.

The exposure brought on scurvy, with which, one after another, many were terribly afflicted. One man died and was buried at sea. Four others were left in the hospital at Valparaiso, but were doing well when last seen. Fresh supplies of water at that place, and a tarry long enough to give all parties fresh meat and vegetables enough, restored health on ship-board.

FROM BRAZIL.

Correspondence of the New-York Times.

PERNAMBUCO, Thursday, Nov. 24, 1859.

More than two months ago the Emperor Don PEDRO II. signified his intention of visiting his Northern Provinces, and this being the first time they had been so honored, each one determined to outdo the others in the reception of their monarch. Our Province, called the most turbulent in the Empire, has always been placed rather low in the list, and considered by our good neighbors of the two large Southern Provinces as one that, being in their opinions backward in everything, could not think of attempting to vie with the rich old City of Bahia; however, the Pernambucanos, who at least in go-aheadativeness, as we call it, have always considered themselves far in advance of Bahia, determined to do their best to show their loyalty, and have worked hard and freely spent their money to prove it and please our Imperial visitors.

News was received on the 20th that the Squadron was to have left Bahia, with the Emperor, on the 19th, and should therefore be off this port by the morning of 21st. Early on Monday the National Guard was called out and everything prepared for the reception. The programme, as arranged for the entry into port, was calculated to produce a really beautiful effect, and was more or less as follows, viz.: As soon as the Squadron was signalized, which would be some four hours before its entry into port, guns were to be fired from the fort—all the pilots in their boats, which were to be decorated with flags, were to sail out, and an enormous fleet of jangadas (the ordinary fishing craft of the Northern provinces, composed of five or six logs of a kind of cork wood, and carrying a tall triangular sail,) with four men, each dressed in white and blue, was to meet the steamers and follow in their wake. All day Monday the people were on the qui vive of expectation, but with no signs of the Imperial visitors. Pernambuco slept that night a disappointed city. On Tuesday morning it awoke and found the visitors had come upon them in the night, and they were deprived of the splendid sight of the entry, as the squadron was already at anchor in the outer roads. The steamer Apa, which bore the Imperial party, entered the inner harbor very soon after sunrise, when the men-of-war and forts saluted, and from all points an immense number of rockets were sent up (a peculiarity, I believe, to Brazil—rockets in the day time,) which sounded like a long-continued fire of musketry.

It is, perhaps, necessary to explain the very singular construction of our harbor, for you to appreciate how peculiarly well adapted it is for a display like the one intended. It is formed by a line of coral reefs, that, extending some three hundred miles up and down the coast, now under water, now above, in some places close to the shore, at others ten miles off, make several natural harbors, which, seen for the first time, are among the most interesting sights possible, and seem to be another proof of the lavish favors with which the Tropics are showered by the hand of Providence, in a land where the inhabitants can almost, if not quite, sustain themselves upon the spontaneous productions of the earth. We have natural sea-walls and harbors, and ready made what in most countries is only the result of years of labor, and the triumphs of human science. Here the reef, cutting a slice, as I may say, from the great Atlantic, appears at low water about six feet above the level, and forms a harbor some two hundred yards wide and three quarters of a mile long. All vessels are moored alongside the reef to cannon, which were placed in the rock by the Dutch, and which have withstood the ravages of time and use for more than two centuries. On the land side the houses come close down to the water's edge, merely separated in most instances by a narrow street or a small wharf, built for embarking. The entrance is at the extreme lower end, where a break in the reef allows vessels of any draught of water to pass, and, were it not for a bank inside, the largest clipper-ships could enter. The Apa having anchored below all the other vessels, and the disembarkation having to take place at the extreme upper end of the harbor, you will see that the Emperor's galley (or barge) must pass up the whole length. All the vessels were decorated with flags, and almost every nation was represented. The foreign houses and Consulates also had their national colors flying. Across the streets hung different flags, with complimentary and loyal inscriptions.

Arrangements had been made by the Municipal Government for the landing to take place at a part of the harbor fronting the Custom-house, and where there was a large square that would allow of the immense crowd that was expected; a pavilion was erected and most tastefully decorated with the national colors, and portraits of the four heroes of the independence that particularly distinguished themselves in driving the Dutch from the Province—viz.: HENRIQUE DIAS, a black, CAMAIAO, an Indian, NEGREIRO and VIEGIA, respectively a Brazilian born and a Portuguese. It was octagonal in form, and surmounted with the figures of Strength, Justice, Arts, Sciences, Peace, Order, Morality and Industry, the ceiling silk, carpeting Brussels, and a raised dais, with two chairs. The whole road over which the Imperial party passed was strewn with cinnamon-leaves, which shed a delicious perfume, and somewhat protected the feet from the hot sand. At exactly 11 o'clock the Imperial barge left the steamer, and immediately the air resounded with the heavy boom of cannon, and was filled with innumerable rockets. Hundreds of boats and jangadas followed in the wake of the barge, which, as it passed up, was most vociferously cheered from the shore and the vessels. Among the latter was easily distinguished the more sonorous hurrah from the Americans and English, and which sounded high above the less uproarious vivas of the Brazilians. The sight was a beautiful one indeed, and I believe the Emperor expressed himself delighted with the "Venice of America." On reaching the place of disembarkation, the Imperial party was met first by about two hundred little girls, all dressed in white, and carrying baskets of flowers, which they scattered before their Majesties; then by the Bishop and all the Provincial authorities, the Consular corps, representatives of the commercial body and hundreds more, who, from their position, either civil or military, were entitled to the honor of an invitation. Over a hundred ladies were present in a body to receive the Empress; the whole square was one mass of people, and the crowd was frightful. It seemed as if the procession would never reach the pavilion—a distance of less than sixty yards—so great was the anxiety manifested by the mass to see their Emperor; but by great exertions a pass was at length effected, and his Majesty entered and was met by the members of the City Government, the President of which delivered him the keys of the city in a short and appropriate speech. The whole party then adjourned to a church close at hand, which had been magnificently arranged for the occasion, and a Te Deum, which lasted some two hours, was sung. A procession was then formed from the church to conduct their Majesties to the Provincial Palace, which had been prepared for their reception, a distance of about a quarter of a mile through a wide street, with tall houses on either side, which were beautifully decorated with tapestries and lace hanging from the windows, and the beauty of Pernambuco and the vicinity on the verandahs. The progress was slow, as the Empress had to sit down several times to rest, finding it very fatiguing. The heat was terrible, and the dust would scarcely allow of breathing; and the ladies suffered severely. As etiquette required every one to walk with hats off, the sun had full effect; happy were those whose heads were plentifully supplied with nature's covering. There was constant cheering from the balconies and windows.

On arrival at the Palace, all those who formed part of the procesrion were allowed to enter, and had the honor of kissing their Majesties' hands before retiring. The sight was a brilliant one, the different uniforms, some of which were very rich, having a most happy effect. The Emperor wore an admiral's full dress, decorated with several orders both foreign and Brazilian. He is a very fine-looking man, remarkably tall and fair, and has rather a German cast of countenance—in that respect resembling, it is said, his mother. The Empress is a sister of the late King of Naples; is very short and stout; has a most affable manner, and inspired generally a most agreeable impression. And thus ended a reception which all classes, with a remarkable harmony, have used their utmost endeavors to make brilliant, a credit to the city, and a pleasure to their Majesties. His Majesty is remarkable for early rising, and the following morning after his arrival went to the Marine Arsenal before 6, taking every one by surprise, (such has been during this northern visit his custom when visiting his public departments,) examined particularly into everything, and expressed very freely his opinions where he found faults; and great hopes are raised that his visit will turn very much to the advantage of this Province, which has always been neglected by the Central Government, and drained of its revenue to improve and beautify Rio de Janeiro and other more favored districts.

The city has been very extensive y illuminated the past nights and the streets crowded with people. Such the enthusiasm and such apparently the anxiety on all hands to please the Imperial visitors, that for three days not an arrest has been made, I was informed, although with crowded streets, and not a policeman visible—no rows, no robberies, nothing but manifestations of pleasure, and this in a city of quite one hundred thousand inhabitants. Last night Don Pedro went all over the city on foot to see the illuminations, constantly surrounded by an immense crowd. He has expressed himself quite delighted and agreeably surprised by his reception in Pernambuco, and his suite declare we have far outdone Bahia.

The Commercial Association has raised a subscription for a ball, which will soon come off, and have taken the initiative in raising a subscription for the formation of an Asylum for Mendicants, which has reached nearly $50,000, as a mark of respect and commemoration of their Majesties' visit, the Emperor having declared, before leaving Rio, that any such works as accrued to the benefit of the provinces or cities he should consider in the light of ovations to himself.

Palmer's White Captive.

A few years ago our City was honored with an exhibition of statuary by an American sculptor whom Albany was proud to claim. Our minds were elevated and our hearts softened as we gazed on his PENANCE, a lovely and noble production as ever came from the chisel, whilst clustered around this central figure were busts and basso relievos of such exquisite purity and feeling, that we have reveled in the memory of them ever since. There was something so truly American in the style—it was something so gratifying to our nationality that a man who had never crossed the ocean to have his spirit imbued with Grecian forms of loveliness and Italian rules of art, should suddenly, in our midst, create such evidences of full maturity, that we exclaimed with enthusiasm, "Here then has arisen what we have waited for, the pioneer—the apostle of a school of American Art," and we felt that the genius of our sculptor was not to be measured by past efforts—that a great career lay before him.

Mr. PALMER gives us now another of his creations, and in this his latest work he seems to have dropped into the old, well-worn European rut; how else could he have flashed his genius upon a subject so objectionable in point of taste and morality. That the art displayed is of a high order, and the workmanship above criticism, is not to be disputed, and it is for that very reason all the more objectionable. That it almost needs a touch of the marble to persuade one that it is not really a lovely woman suddenly unveiled to the vulgar gaze, makes all the stronger our protest against this attack on the decorum of American manners. In gazing upon it, are we not taking the first returning step towards the barbarism of the savages, whose act of obscene cruelty it is intended to depict? An opinion seems to obtain with some that implies want of purity to object to nude statuary, but one has only to regard the costumes of civilization and of barbarism for a forcible refutation of such an idea—the nakedness of the savage and the elaborate drapery of enlightened nations. Furthermore, of the ladies we have known who have traveled abroad, the noblest, purest, and most thoroughly cultivated, have told us of the shrinking and almost loathing with which they sometimes found themselves suddenly confronting one of the multitudinous nude Venuses of the Italian galleries. And in this connection we take occasion to speak of the unblushing effrontery with which the exhibition room of the "White Captive" is sometimes made a convenient lounging and flirtation place. We have all of us in the persons of our mothers, wives, or children, learned to attach a certain sanctity to the female form, which makes us instinctively shrink with pain when we see young girls hanging on the arms of leisurely-looking men, eye glass in hand, surveying the "White Captive" from every point, coolly making their criticisms, or warmly expressing their admiration, and we find ourselves vainly striving to fit to them MILTON's glowing lines on the first woman:

——"that what she wills to do or say,
Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best.
Greatness of mind and nobleness, their seat
Build in her loveliest, and create an awe
About her, as a guard angelic placed."

In great contrast to "The White Captive," in point of chasteness, is one of the latest productions of the lamented CRAWFORD—"The Aurora"—a statue which graces the drawing-room of an eminent physician in this city. The pliant drapery folds about each beautiful curve, revealing and enhancing the charm, down to the very ankle, and seems as instinct with motion, life and grace, as the radiant goddess herself. We confess that we do not see what the poet calls "soul triumphant in the feet" of the "White Captive," but we clearly see in CRAWFORD's "Aurora" that the female form and the robe that veils it are wonderfully invested with the same spirit, as if one were an integral part of the other, and that we think the result of true genius, something unattainable by the mere mechanic.

It was fitting that the old Greek to whom body was all, should yield the first niche to the beautiful nude, but it is spirit that the new Gospel seeks to honor and elevate, and in accordance with the genius of Christianity that artist walks in a higher plane of art who brings the fullest inspiration of his genius to the head and face, the seat of the soul, and makes drapery, to us, what muscles and sinews were to the eye of ancient heathendom. ## The Newport Kidnapping Case.

A recent number of your paper contains a communication signed "THOMAS M. CLARK, Bishop of the Diocese of Rhode Island," in relation to a young girl that it is charged "has recently been enticed to return to New-Orleans, and that now she is liable to be sold to the highest bidder, unless the sum of $1,000 can be raised for her rescue." In reply to this allegation, Bishop CLARK authoritatively states "that the girl returned to the place of her birth at the instigation of her mother, and of her own free will, notwithstanding the earnest remonstrance of her friends in Providence."

Bishop CLARK further states, that he has "positive evidence that the girl is now residing with her mother in New-Orleans," and that "having been born a slave, according to the laws of Louisiana, she is now liable to be sold by the State, unless some one claims her." Bishop CLARK further alleges, that "to prevent this, and also to clear himself of any legal liability in case the girl should fall into crime, the gentleman who originally owned her desires that her mother should purchase her at a nominal price," and that "it is probable that she has thus been transferred to her mother before the present time."

Although it is not to be doubted that Bishop CLARK'S statements are critically accurate, it is to be regretted, in view of the excitement the transaction to which he refers has caused in Rhode Island, that he has not more definitely rehearsed the data upon which they are founded, and these remarks are made under the hope that they may draw from him an answer in full, to the allegations that have been made by the girl and her friends, accompanied with a statement of the testimony and facts upon which it is founded. So far as the writer's knowledge extends the story of the girl, as narrated by herself and friends, is mainly as follows:

That she was brought to Newport some ten years ago, then quite a little child. That she was admitted into the Sunday Schools, and apparently associated with by other children on an equality, being not darker than many of the Caucasian race. About the period of the death of the lady who brought the girl to Newport she was placed at service, and when about fifteen years of age was living with a family in Providence, when a woman and a tall black man came and hurried the girl off, the woman saying that she had property for the girl, and that she thought she should settle in New-York. In a letter to a friend in Newport, under date of Oct. 9, 1859, the girl herself, on this point, simply says, "last Winter my mother came for me," and that she was told by a female friend that her mother might sell her if she returned to New-Orleans. The Providence Journal alleges that the mother and two other colored people came to Providence, and "partly by persuasion and partly by force, succeeded in carrying her off." This would seem to imply a case of abduction. The girl further says, that "on the 9th of September I was arrested by two police officers," through the agency, as she alleges, of a friend of the gentleman claiming her as his property, who had orders "to carry me to the negro traders' yard, to be sold to the highest bidder; but the officers took pity on me, and locked me up in jail for safe keeping, because if they carried me to the traders' yard my mother would not see me again." It would seem, if the girl's statement is to be relied upon, that there was a time when she wished to return North, for she says that "when I wanted to come back, Mr. —— said that they had dressed me up so that I would not know my work." She further says, that "they want a thousand dollars for me;" that "she never had the thought that Mr.—— would do the like of that;" and that "the officers think it is a very mean thing, indeed." The statements made by the girl in this letter are substantially reiterated in another of the same date, addressed to a lady in Providence, in which last she says: "They want to sell me on some cotton or sugar plantation, if my mother or father can't buy me. They want a thousand dollars for me." She also alleges in this letter that "when I wanted to go back, Mr. ——," the gentleman claiming her, "said that I had been home, and dressed up so, that I would not be fit to work, and that he gave an order to Mr. —— to have me carried to a negro trader's yard, to be sold to the highest bidder; but the officers took pity on me and carried me to jail, where he could not get me;" adding "that if I had not been put there my mother would never see me again." In both letters she speaks of being unwell, having "a very bad cold from being in jail."

In a letter from the girl's mother, dated New-Orleans, Sept. 16, 1859, addressed to a gentleman in Rhode Island, she says that on the 10th of that month "my house was suddenly assailed by two police officers, bearers of an order from ——," the gentleman referred to by the girl, "which order authorized them to enter my premises, and then and there arrest, without any notice, my daughter, and to lodge her in the police jail, and from thence to be transferred to a trader's yard, so she could be sold on some cane or cotton plantation."

The writer has before him, a letter from a gentleman in New-Orleans, under date of 3d of November, 1859, from which the following sentence, referring to the girl, is extracted: "To prevent her being placed with a trader for sale, the mother has agreed to pay $1,000 for her. Nothing yet paid, nor any act of sale passed; it will be soon." This gentleman had been requested to inquire into the facts of the case on the spot at an early date, and it would seem from the tenor of the letter that he obtained his information in part, if not in whole, from the person whom both the girl and mother allege to be the agent through whom the sale was contracted.

In a letter from the girl to a lady in Rhode Island, under date of 20th November, 1859, she alludes incidentally to the bill of sale being in the possession of Mr. ——, a Notary Public, and further says, "they have sold me to mother," and that the bill of sale had been forwarded for signature to the wife of the gentleman by whose orders she had been sold, but that she declines signing it. If this statement of the girl is to be relied on, it would seem not only to conflict with that of Bishop CLARK, in regard to the girl's being owned in his own right, by the gentleman to whom the Bishop alludes; but the refusal of his wife to perfect the bill of sale, might give some color to the allegation that has been made in some quarters, to the effect that the girl, if a slave at all, really belongs to an estate now in the hands of executors—the same executors being trustees for several orphan infants who inherit a small property contingent upon the payment of the debts of the testator, among whose assets the price of the girl in question constitutes a very important item.

Whatever may be the real merits of the case, it would seem no more than right and proper that, before abandoning this more than orphaned child to a life of servitude and shame, Bishop CLARK should favor the public with something further in regard to the nature of the testimony upon which his conclusions are founded, for it certainly does seem, from the narrative of the mother and girl, sustained as it is by other testimony, that some person or persons did intend, previous to the affair being exposed, to obtain something more than a "nominal price" for the poor girl, however that intention may have since been modified or abandoned, and justice to the suspected parties would seem to demand a disclosure as to who was to receive the $1,000. Bishop CLARK states that the "young girl," previous to her abduction from Providence, "had been for some time a member of the Sunday-school of Grace Church, of that city." How appropriate then would it seem to be if this little orphaned lamb has been "enticed to return to New-Orleans," by wolves in sheeps' clothing, come from what quarter they may, there to be delivered over to the spoiler, that he himself, as Bishop and shepherd of Christ's fold, should "leave the ninety-and-nine of his flock in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it," and "when he hath found it," bind up its wounds, pouring therein oil and wine, and lay it on his shoulders and return with it to Providence "rejoicing!" Verily, verily, the good Bishop would then find many of his "friends and neighbors" ready to rejoice with him, who have now sore misgivings in regard to the fate of the missing lamb of his flock, notwithstanding the shepherd's assurance that it is "probable she has been transferred to her mother," for a "nominal price." ## Personal Liberty Bills.

WHAT STATES HAVE ENACTED THEM.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Will you allow me to correct one or two errors that appear in your paper—one of which especially has a rather important bearing.

One of your editorials states that Vermont is the only State which has passed a Personal Liberty bill; that in Massachusetts it was vetoed, and in New-York defeated in the Senate. The facts are these:

In 1850 Vermont led the way, immediately after the passage of the Fugitive Slave bill, by adopting a stringent Personal Liberty law.

In 1855 the Legislature of Massachusetts passed one yet more stringent, which was vetoed by Gov. GARDNER on May 21, 1855, and immediately passed over his head by 22 to 3 in the Senate, and 230 to 76 in the House, and it is still the law.

Michigan adopted a similar law at the same time.

Wisconsin adopted a yet more stringent law afterwards, declaring all liens or executions upon judgments obtained under the Fugitive Slave law absolutely void; and this law has been enforced. It is no abstraction, but a real working law.

All these laws secure trial by jury to every fugitive slave.

Maine has forbidden all State officers from assisting in capturing or holding fugitives from labor, and has denied the use of her jails.

These laws will be found in Laws of Massachusetts, 1855, p. 924; Laws of Michigan, 1855, p. 413; Revised Statutes of Wisconsin, ch. 158, p. 912; Revised Statutes of Maine, 489, 491; Laws of Vermont, 1850.

In this State the Liberty bill received 64 votes, against 22 in the Assembly, and failed in the Senate only from want of time—not of votes. Another bill, which simply forbade the taking of a fugitive at all, under any circumstances, failed in both Houses, for want of votes, as you state. This latter bill is the one that also failed by a few votes in Massachusetts and New-Hampshire.

You will no doubt agree that no prophet is required to foretell that a Personal Liberty bill of some sort will be enacted by our incoming Legislature.

I wish further to note, for the benefit of your Washington correspondent, that Mr. BONHAM, of South Carolina, was not an "Anti-Lecomptonite," but, on the contrary, he strenuously supported the Lecompton bill, and was so determined in its favor that he refused to support the "English" bill, because it sacrificed Lecompton. I think "Nobody" owes Mr. BONHAM an apology.

Your correspondent speaks to-day of Mr. "THOS. Dawes ELIOT," of the "Adams District" of Massachusetts. Mr. T. D. ELIOT represents the New-Bedford District. Mr. H. L. Dawes represents Adams. Which is the one intended? Yours, obediently,

The Northern Railroad of New-Jersey.

PIERMONT, Tuesday, Dec. 20, 1859.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Having been an almost constant reader of THE TIMES from its commencement, I will give it credit for noticing promptly most of the important events which occur throughout the civilized world, and particularly those which interest your home readers, but I have never seen any special notice or allusion to the "Northern Railroad of New Jersey," which now constitutes one of the many and important avenues connecting the City of New-York with the adjacent country. In fact I believe that THE TIMES was not represented at the celebration which was held at Piermont on the 26th of May last, in honor of the completion of the road from Piermont to Jersey City.

The affair, however, was duly chronicled by some of the other City papers, and I will now, with your permission, proceed to inflict upon your readers a brief account of the road from its first inception to the present time, with the single preliminary remark, that the name or title of a railroad is generally supposed to bear some coincidence, or relation, either to the route which it occupies or the places which it connects; but this particular road has never, so far as I have learned, been considered open to that objection.

From the time of opening the Eastern Division of the New-York and Erie Railroad, in 1841, to the leasing of the line of road from Sufferns viâ Patterson to Jersey City, by the New-York and Erie Railroad Company in 1852, the inhabitants of Rockland County had been very well accommodated, by having three or four daily trains and boats running in both directions between Sufferns, Piermont and New-York. But since that time they have had only one daily train connecting with a small and inconvenient boat to and from New-York, through the Summer. And, in the Winter, they have been obliged to go from Piermont "around the Horn," as it was called, viâ Sufferns to New-York, traveling a distance of about fifty miles and back, at an expense of from eighty cents to one dollar in each direction.

The distance from New-York to Piermont is twenty-five miles; from Piermont to Sufferns, eighteen miles, and from Sufferns to New-York thirty-two miles. Consequently that portion of the country bounded by these three lines, presents the form of a scalene triangle, with the front, or river side, rock-bound, a great portion of its length, by the Palisades.

This circumstance accounts for the fact, which has never been fully understood or appreciated, that no portion of the country contiguous to New-York, and lying within the same distance of it, has been so much secluded, and so difficult of access, as the front or easterly side of this triangular territory, embracing, as it does, the most desirable portions of Hudson and Bergen Counties, N. J., and Rockland County, N. Y., for purposes of country residences.

The only public conveyance through any portion of it, previous to the construction of the Northern Railroad, was a line of stages running over a plank-road from Hoboken to Hackensack two or three times each day. Good improved farms, with convenient and substantial buildings, could be bought at from sixty to eighty dollars per acre. And the uncultivated timber lands lying along the top and westerly slope of the Palisades were held at from twenty to forty dollars per acre.

Early in 1854 the expediency of commencing the construction of this Railroad was discussed by Messrs. ELEAZER LORD, THOS. E. BLANCHE, SILAS SEYMOUR and others in Rockland County, New-York; and Messrs. THOS. W. DEMOREST, JOHN VAN BRUNT, RALPH DEMOREST, THOS. H. HERRING, THOS. CUMMINGS, Jr., and others, in New-Jersey; and during the Fall of that year a preliminary survey and estimate was made, by Major D. P. DEWITT, under the direction of S. SEYMOUR, which demonstrated that the line would be unusually cheap and direct.

During the ensuing year, a Company was organized under a charter previously obtained from the Legislature of New-Jersey, and $136,000 of stock were subscribed by the farmers and others residing along the line of the proposed road. In 1857, Mr. WILLIAM SKEDEN was appointed Chief Engineer, and he made a careful survey and location of the line. Early in 1858, a contract was concluded by the Company with Messrs. BRADFORD S. SEYMOUR and JAMES M. TOWER for the construction and equipment of the road.

The work was immediately commenced, and prosecuted with great vigor by the contractors; and completed, so as to connect with the New-York and Erie Railroad at the slaughter-house west of Bergen Hill on the 26th of May, 1859. The road was run by, and for the benefit of, the contractors until the 1st of October last, when the contract was canceled, and it was delivered to the Company at a total cost, including outfit, of about $344,000, or an average of about $16,000 per mile for 21 28-100 miles, this being the distance actually constructed between the Piermont and Bergen junctions. That portion of the road lying within the State of New-York was constructed under a special act of the Legislature, authorizing its extension to Piermont.

The Company have issued a mortgage upon the road of $200,000, running twenty years, and bearing seven per cent. interest, payable semi-annually in New-York.

The line of the road, as at present operated, commences at the lower Piermont station, (which is about one mile from the end of the Pier,) and follows the track of the Piermont branch of the New-York and Erie Railroad about one mile, to the upper Piermont station. It then diverges from the line of the Erie road, and takes a southerly direction, passing through, or near the villages of Tappantown, Closter, Schraalenbergh, Englewood, English Neighborhood, New Durham, and within four miles of Hackensack, (at the crossing of the plank road at Kelly's,) to the junction of the main line of the New-York and Erie Railroad on the west side of Bergen Hill. From this point it follows the track of the New-York and Erie Railroad through the Bergen cut to the Cortlandt-street Ferry-house at Jersey City. The entire distance being twenty-five and one half miles, or about one hour's run with a passenger train.

The line from the upper Piermont station to Bergen junction runs nearly parallel with, and from one to two miles from the west shore of the Hudson river; and near the foot of the westerly slope of the Palisade ridge. It is, for all practical purposes, equal to an air line, and the grade line is nearly level. There are no draw, or truss bridges, or high embankments upon the road. After the completion of the Bergen Tunnel, it will be optional with the Company whether to terminate the road at Jersey City, Long Dock, or Hoboken.

The management of the Company is in the hands of the following gentlemen as Directors, all of whom are known to be men of high standing and ability in the communities where they reside: Hon. Thos. H. Herring, President, and Messrs. Thos. W. Demarest, Cornelius D. Van Wagenen, Isaac M. Dederer, Thos. Cummings, Jr., Ralph S. Demarest and John Van Brunt. Hon. Thos. W. Demarest acted as President and Jno. N. Billings as Director, during the construction of the road, after which they resigned.

Since the 1st October last, Mr. BRADFORD S. SEYMOUR, one of the contractors, and brother of the late H. C. SEYMOUR, (formerly State Engineer and Superintendent of the New-York and Erie Railroad,) has been appointed General Superintendent; and he is now devoting his entire time, large railroad experience, and untiring energy to the successful operation of the road.

Having already trespassed upon your columns to a greater length than I originally intended, I will reserve for a future communication some remarks upon the business of the road; its effect upon the country through which it passes, and the prospect of its early extension up the west shore of the Hudson to Nyack, Rockland Lake, Haverstraw, &c. ROCKLAND.

A New Religious Society in Kansas.

The Lawrence (Kansas) Herald publishes a long statement from Messrs. LADD, OLDHAM and STEARNS, who act as a Committee on behalf of a new religious Society, which has been formed in that place. The organization seems to be a reformatory institution. It has appointed "Committees" on benevolence, on public reforms, on intellectual culture, &c., and the basis of the system is "reason." The Committee say:

"We believe that the time has fully come for Reason to assert her prerogatives, and for her to be enthroned upon the altar of Religion. The attempt has too long been made to divorce Reason from Faith—to teach that Reason will lead to infidelity—and must not be obeyed fully in religious matters. Now, we most emphatically believe, that so far from Religion and Reason being in the least degree inimical to each other, they are twin-born sisters, and both of them the fair daughters of the Church of the living God. In other words, the church in Heaven being the bride—the Lamb's wife—Religion and Reason are the fruits of that mystic union, the heavenly visitants sent down to earth by the mighty Jehovah, to adorn and beautify it with their sacred presence."

One article of the Constitution reads as follows:

"ART. 3. The members of this Association hereby agree, in their weekly and other meetings, and at all other times and places, as far as is consistent with their business relations and the proprieties of life, to labor for the elucidation and advancement of humanitary principles in morals and theology."

DR. FRANKLIN ABROAD.

A Curious Letter, hitherto Unpublished, from Benjamin Franklin.

The following letter, which we believe has never been published hitherto, gives some very curious notes of the observations and reflections of Dr. FRANKLIN upon his first visit to France. It is addressed to his wife:

PARIS, Sept. 14, 1767.

DEAR POLLY: I am always pleased with a letter from you, and I flatter myself that you may be sometimes pleased with one from me, though it should be of little importance, such as this, which is to consist of a few occasional remarks made here and on my journey hither.

Soon after I left you in that agreeable society at Bromley, I took the resolution of making a trip with Sir JOHN PRINGLE into France. We set out on the 26th past. All the way to Dover we were furnished with post-chaises hung so as to lean forward, the top coming down over one's eyes like a hood, as if to prevent one's seeing the country, which being one of my greatest pleasures, I was engaged in perpetual disputes with the inn-keepers and postilions about getting the straps taken up a hole or two before, and let down as much behind, they insisting the chaise leaning forward was an ease to the horses, and that the contrary would kill them. They added their reasons for this, which were no reasons at all, and made me, as upon a hundred other occasions, almost wish that mankind had not been endowed with a reasoning faculty, since they know so little how to make use of it, and so often mislead themselves by it, and that they had been furnished with a good sensible instinct instead of it.

At Dover the next morning, we embarked for Calais with a number of passengers who had not been before at sea. They would previously make a hearty breakfast, because if the wind should fail we might not get over till supper time. Doubtless they thought that when they had paid for their breakfast they had a right to it, and that when they had swallowed it they were sure of it. But they were obliged to deliver it up. If you, my dear friend, ever go to sea, take my advice, and live sparingly a day or two beforehand; the sickness, if any, will be lighter, and sooner over. Got to Calais that day.

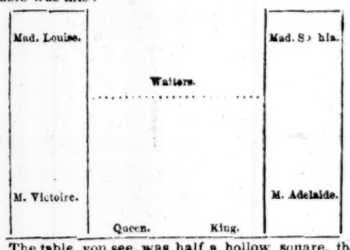
Various impositions are suffered from boatmen, porters, &c., on both sides of the water. I know not which are most rapacious, the English or the French; but the latter have, with their knavery, the most politeness.

The roads we found equally good with ours in England. But then the poor peasants complained to us sadly that they were obliged to work upon the roads full two months in the year, without being paid for their labor; whether this is true or no, or whether, like Englishmen, they grumble, cause or no cause, I have not been able fully to inform myself. The women we saw on the road to Boulogne, and in the inns and villages, were generally of dark complexions; but arriving at Abbeville, we found a sudden change—a multitude of women in that place appearing remarkably fair.

As soon as we left Abbeville the swarthiness returned. I speak generally; for here are some fair women as at Paris, who, I think, are not whitened by art. As to rouge, they don't pretend to imitate nature in laying it on. There is no gradual diminution of color from the full bloom on the middle of the cheek to the faint tint near the sides; nor does it show itself differently in different faces. I have not yet had the honor of being at a lady's toilet, to see how it is laid on; but I fancy I could tell you how it is done. Cut a hole of three inches' diameter in a piece of paper; place it on the side of your face in such a manner as that the top of the hole may be just under your eye; then, with a brush dipped in the color, paint your face and paper together; so when the paper is taken off, there will remain a patch of red exactly the form of the hole. This is the mode from the actress on the stage upwards, through all the ranks of ladies to the Princesses of the blood; but it stops there, the Queen not using it, having in the serenity, complacency and benignity that shine so eminently in (or rather through) her countenance, sufficient beauty, though now an old woman, to do extremely well without it.

You see I speak of the Queen as if I had seen her, and so I have; for you must know I have been at Court. We went to Versailles last Sunday, and had the honor of being presented to the King. He spoke to us both very graciously and cheerfully; is a handsome man, has a very lively look and appears younger than he is.

In the evening we were at the Grand Couvert, when the family sup in public. The form of those sitting at table was this:



The table, you see, was half a hollow square, the service gold. When either made a sign for drink the word was given by one of the waiters. "A boire pour le Roi," or, "A boire pour la Reine," &c. Then two persons within the square approached, one with wine and the other with water, in the carafes; each drank a little glass of what they brought, and then put both the carafes, with a little glass on a salver, and presented it.

The distance from each other was such as that three other chairs might have been placed between any two of them. An officer of the Court brought us up through the crowd of spectators, and placed Sir JOHN so as to stand between the King and Madame ADELAIDE, and me between the Queen and Madame VICTOIRE. The King talked a good deal to Sir JOHN, asking many questions about our royal family; and did me too the honor of taking some notice of me. That's saying enough; for I would not have you think me so much pleased with this King and Queen, as to have a whit less regard than I used to have for ours. No Frenchman shall go beyond me in thinking my own King and Queen the very best in the world, and the most amiable.

The civilities we everywhere receive give us the strongest impressions of French politeness. It seems to be a point settled here universally, that strangers are to be treated with respect; and one has just the same deference shown one here, by being a stranger, as in England by being a lady. The Custom-house officers at Porte St. Denis, as we entered Paris, were about to seize two dozen of excellent Bordeaux wine, given us at Boulogne, and which we brought with us; but as soon as they found we were strangers, it was immediately remitted to us on that account.

At the church of Notre Dame, where we went to see a magnificent illumination, with figures, &c., for the deceased Dauphiness, we found an immense crowd, who were kept out by the guard; but the officer being told we were strangers from England, he immediately admitted us, accompanied, and showed us everything. Why don't we practice this urbanity to Frenchmen? Why should they be allowed to out-do us in anything?

Traveling is one way of lengthening lives, at least in appearance. It is only a fortnight since I left London, but the variety of scenes we have gone through makes it seem equal to six months living in one place. Perhaps I have suffered a greater change, too, in my own person than I could have done in six years at home. I had not been here six days before my taylor and peruquier had transformed me into a Frenchman. Only think what a figure I make in a little bag-wig and naked ears.

They told me I had become twenty years younger, and looked very gallant; so being in Paris where the mode is to be sacredly followed, I was once very near making love to my friend's wife.

This letter will cost you a shilling; and you may think it cheap when you consider that it cost me at least fifty guineas to get into the situation that enables me to write it. Besides, I might, if I had staid at home, have won, perhaps, two shillings of you at cribbage. By the way, now I mention cards, let me tell you that "quadrille" is quite out of fashion here; and English whist all the mode at Paris and at Court.

And pray look upon it as no small matter that, surrounded as I am by the glories of the world, and by dissipations and amusements of all sorts, I remember you and DOLLY, and all the dear folks at Bromley. It is true I cannot help it, but must and ever shall remember you all with pleasure. Need I add that I am particularly, my dear, good friend,

Yours, most affectionately,

B. FRANKLIN.

The Mount Vernon Enterprise.

MR. JOHN A. WASHINGTON SOLVENT—THE PROPERTY SECURE.

Miss CUNNINGHAM, Regent of the Mount Vernon Ladies Association, publishes the following statement:

TO THE PUBLIC.

A statement has appeared in many of the public prints to the effect that Mr. JOHN A. WASHINGTON had failed, and the Mount Vernon Association had lost the money paid over to him, in consequence of mortgages and liens upon the estate! I have delayed the contradiction of these rumors until I could receive, from proper authority, such facts as would, for the future, make it impossible for the public to repeat a similar assertion. I, therefore, lay before you not only a letter of the Clerk of the county where the deeds are recorded, but also a full expose of all the grants and titles of the "Mount Vernon Estate," from the first grant. The $6,000 referred to in the letter was long since paid by Mr. WASHINGTON.

Gentlemen of the Press, throughout the country, who have given circulation to the rumor of Mr. WASHINGTON'S insolvency, will please give publication to the falsity of the statements as contained in the letter below. ANN PAMELA CUNNINGHAM,

Regent Mt. Vernon L. A. U.

CLERK'S OFFICE, FAIRFAX COUNTY COURT, Dec. 12, 1859.

MADAM: Yours of the 6th inst. has been received. JOHN A. WASHINGTON, Esq., of Mount Vernon has title to 1,225 acres of land in this county, known as the "Mount Vernon Estate." It was conveyed to him by his mother, MRS. JANE C. WASHINGTON, on the 18th day of September, 1849, under the authority vested in her by the will of her husband, JOHN A. WASHINGTON, the elder. The conveyance was in fee, without any charge or reservation whatever, except to Mrs. WASHINGTON, the fishing shores thereon during her life, and a charge of $6,000 to Mrs. WM. F. ALEXANDER. The property at the time of the conveyance was clear of all incumbrances whatever, and Mr. WASHINGTON, since the said conveyance to him, has never mortgaged the same or otherwise incumbered it; nor is there any judgment against him, or other lien upon the said land, except that in the deed from Mrs. WASHINGTON to him as aforesaid.

The contract between the Regent of the Mount Vernon Association and Mr. WASHINGTON is dated the 6th day of April, 1858, and was admitted to record in this Court on the 19th day of April, 1858.

Most respectfully, yours,

ALFRED MOSS, Clerk.

DEATH OF A NUN.—Yesterday morning the funeral obsequies of Sister MARY CYRILLE DE NECKERE, who died on Sunday morning, were performed in the Church of the Assumption, Spring Garden-street, below Twelfth. The church was thronged to excess. Rev. Mr. CARTER, Pastor, officiated. The deceased was 36 years old, and was 15 years in religion, as a Sister of the Convent of Notre Dame. She was a niece of the late Archbishop DE NECKERE, of New-Orleans, and had two brothers who were Jesuit priests. She was connected with the Church of the Assumption for two years, and was a teacher in the Academy for young ladies attached thereto.—Philadelphia Pennsylvanian, Dec. 28.

A SHIP FOR THE NAUTICAL SCHOOL.—The ship Rockall has been purchased by WAINWRIGHT & TAPPAN, for $12,000, to be used as a nautical school for boys of the State Reform School. The ship is of 700 tons burden, and will be able to accommodate 150 boys, with the necessary officers. The vessel is in good condition, and the purchase includes spare sails, spars, &c., of the value of about $600. The name of the vessel will probably be changed, and it is expected she will be located in Boston Harbor, and that the school will be commenced in the coming Spring. A practice-vessel, brig-rigged, of 100 tons, is also to be purchased for the use of the school. Negotiations are now in progress to secure such a vessel.—Boston Traveller, Dec. 28.

LAW REPORTS.

Singular Suit for Slander.

Russell C. Root vs. Richard T. Hartshorn.—This was an action for slander, the particulars of which were stated in the TIMES of Nov. 29. It has been on trial for many days before Justice JAMES, at Circuit, and was concluded a day or two since.

The slander complained of consisted in having charged the plaintiff with having sworn to seventeen lies, reference being made to plaintiff's testimony on a certain trial.

In charging the jury, Justice JAMES in substance, said that the questions of fact were entirely with the jury, the province of the Court being to interpret the law and call attention to the leading features of the case. If it came to the question of damages, it was for the jury to determine the amount, which in a suit of this nature could not be proven. It was an action of slander, and the complaint contained two counts. The first averred that the defendant charged plaintiff with having "sworn to seventeen lies, either of which would send him to the State Prison," in a certain prior proceeding. The second count averred that defendant asserted that plaintiff was "a perjured villain." Both counts had been proven, and defendant admitted the utterance of the words, but denied malice, and in his answer sets up in justification the truth of the charges, and he specified 20 instances in which he alleged that plaintiff had testified falsely on the trial referred to. That trial grew out of the publication of "The Marine Register," and the matter in controversy in that trial was the authorship, copyright, the terms of publication, receipts, sales and expenses. Judge JAMES desired them to bear in mind that any statement made in that trial, however false, was not perjury unless it was material to the issues therein, or to some matters connected therewith which bore on that controversy.

The first specification was that Root swore that "Taylor, Hartshorn & King came to his store together in December, 1856, when the publication was proposed." The allegation was that Hartshorn went to the store when the publication was proposed in January. The specification was not proven as averred, and if it were, Judge JAMES said he could not see how the fact was material in the former trial, and perjury could not be predicated upon it.

The second specification was that Root swore that he "told them the difficulty of reading such matter, not being accustomed to it, where all were proper names, and if Taylor, Hartshorn & King would take that off their hands they would give them (T., H. & K.) three-fifths of the net profits." The proof was that Root swore that T., H. & K. proposed to divide the profit equally, and that the final arrangement was made some weeks afterwards, and that the proposition, somewhat as stated, was then made, except that the proof was that the proposition to take the reading off their hands came from T., H. & K. Defendant denied that Root said any such thing. The proof was balanced and the proof was that the proofs were read by T., H. & K., and they did share three-fifths of the profits. It was difficult to see how this was material, as the agreement was in writing.

The third specification was that Root showed Taylor, Hartshorn & King the accounts several times—particularly to Hartshorn, and explained them to him one day. The answer denied that they ever showed the accounts, or made the explanation. The proof was that Root swore as stated, but, in addition, denied that he meant the ledger. Taylor swore he had been shown the ledger. Root's clerks swore that they had shown the accounts, and Allison, Root's partner, testified that he had cast up the ledger account several times, and showed it to Taylor, Hartshorn & King, and explained it to them.

The fourth specification was that Root swore that Taylor, Hartshorn & King never made any objection to the items of the account until the progress of that suit. The proof on this was the same as on the third specification.

The fifth specification was that Root swore that "all the materials used in the register were charged at the cost price to Taylor, Hartshorn & Co., and no profit charged to Root & Co." There was no attempt to show that a profit was charged on the paper used, but that some seven or eight reams of paper were charged for more than was used. This would not falsify the claim that there was no profit charged; and, besides, no expert was called to show that more was used than was necessary. In the printer's bill it was shown that, in the ordinary course of trade, Root & Co. were entitled to six months' credit; but, the printer wanting money before it came due, Root paid him, deducting the discount, which deduction he did not carry to the credit of the joint account, but to himself,—it being proven that Root & Co. were to furnish the capital to carry on the publication. The Judge charged that, in the ordinary course of business, Root & Co. would be entitled to this discount, and not the joint account.

The sixth specification was that Root swore that "the first time he heard that T. H. & K. claimed to be authors, was when they brought a paper to transfer the copyright." The evidence upon this point was diverse, but was only material as bearing upon the question of Root's knowledge of their making a previous claim to that stated.

The seventh specification was that Root swore he did not know that anybody were authors if T. H. & K. were not, "up to this time." As this was the expression of an opinion, and not the assertion of a fact, and not material to the issue, perjury could not be predicated upon the statement, nor could it be a basis of justification of the charge. If, however, the jury believed that Root meant to assert a falsehood that he did know, then it would amount to sufficient basis on which to rest the charge of his having uttered an untruth.

The eighth specification was that Root swore, "We proposed such a work in 1852, but were advised not to publish it." The Court charged that the proof did not sustain the allegation—that it showed that Root did not swear that he prepared such a work, but that they conceived and proposed such a work.

The ninth specification involved the question of the authorship of the rules; the charge being that Root swore that J. W. Griffith wrote them from a draft by T. H. & K.; that Griffith told him so, and that T. H. & K. had not the ability so to write them. The point was whether Griffith told Root so. If he had, and yet never had written them, Root told an untruth, but was not guilty of perjury. The remainder of the specification was the expression of an opinion, and unless it could be shown that Root knew T. H. & K. had the ability, perjury could not be predicated upon that.

The tenth specification was that Root testified that the rules were revised by the Board of Underwriters, and matter stricken out and new matter inserted by the Underwriters. This was proven substantially as alleged. T. H. & K. testified that the Board of Underwriters never made alterations, and that the book was printed as written by themselves. Plaintiff had proved that Mr. Werring, an inspector, had had proofs, and had made many alterations, but he could not say they were inserted in the work. It was proven by Mr. Smith, a member of the Board, that he made many alterations in proof. The jury must judge from the evidence. The eleventh specification was that "Root swore T. H. & K. never objected to these alterations." T. H. & K. testified that they did object But Root had not testified that T. H. & K. knew of these alterations, and if they did not know of them, they could not object. They might have made general objections, and if so, it did not prove that Mr. Root swore falsely in saying that the alterations were made by the Board of Underwriters, and that T. H. & K. did not object to them. But if T. H. & K. did know of these alterations, and did object, and Root swears they did not, then it might be that one or the other swore falsely. It was the duty of the jury to remark the testimony, if they could, consistent with the truth of either party, and only in the event of their being unable to do so were they to fix false swearing upon either. The twelfth and thirteenth specifications were that Root swore he had consulted different members of the Underwriters, who said if T. H. & K.'s name were in the book it would kill it. That he explained this to T. H. & K., who made no objections when it was explained. The proof by Mr. Walter, Secretary of the Underwriters, was that he had so stated to Mr. Root. The perjury alleged consists in saying that T. H. & K. did not object to their name being left out of the book. From the proof the Court charged it was uncertain whether Root did not mean that they made no objection to assertion of Walter. The jury must consider the materiality of this upon the former trial, and then judge of the credibility of the witness. In the fourteenth specification, perjury is alleged in Root's swearing that T. H. & K. had not requested the copyright to be taken out in their name before it was taken out. The Court charged that the proof did not contradict the statement of Mr. Root, but they were to take into consideration all the evidence of the former trial, and determine the result for themselves. The fifteenth specification was proved, but the Court charged that there was no sufficient evidence for its falsity. The sixteenth and seventeenth specifications charged that Root swore the rules were printed from Mr. Lawson's and not from T. H. & K.'s copy. The testimony upon this point was in conflict; but it might be that the rules were drawn up T. H. & K., left at Root's store, taken away and revised by Lawson, put into type. If the jury found that what plaintiff meant was the rules were not printed from T. H. & K.'s manuscript, then there was no perjury. But if they found that Root meant to say that T. H. & K.'s manuscript was not put in type at all, then they might find that Root swore to what was false, and if so they must decide if it was with intent to commit perjury. The eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth specifications the Court did not attach much importance to. The Court, in conclusion, charged that if the jury found that Root had sworn falsely in any one instance it justified the second count, and went so far to justify the first count as to make the damages merely nominal. He stated also, that it was at the discretion of the jury to assess punitive damages.

Verdict for plaintiff damages, $50.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

The House of Representatives listened yesterday to the conclusion of Mr. Morris' invective against the Administration, and heard a plea from Mr. Millson in mitigation. Mr. Grow then took the floor to reply to some remarks made some days before by Mr. Branch, of North Carolina, in which the Pennsylvania Representative was charged with defeating the Post-office Appropriation bill. Mr. Grow vehemently repelled the accusation, and declared it unworthy of a gentleman. A sharp colloquy ensued, in which Mr. Branch announced that he should hold Mr. Grow responsible for his words, and the affair was left to be settled as the temper of the two gentlemen, upon reflection, may suggest. Mr. Pryor, of Virginia, obtained the floor for a speech reiterating the charge of disorganization as applicable to the Republicans, and announcing the determination of himself and his friends to resist the election of a Republican to the end of the present Congress. Mr. Pryor was interrupted by Messrs. Hickman and McKnight, of Pennsylvania, who interpolated explanations; the latter referring to a paper signed by all the Virginia Congressmen some years since, in which the doctrine of an "irrepressible conflict" was more distinctly stated than it had ever been since. Previous to the ballot for Speaker, Mr. Maynard, of Tennessee, withdrew his name from the list, as not likely to concentrate the necessary strength. Mr. Scott, of California, was then urged upon the conservatives as an unexceptionable man; and the vote was taken. It resulted, Sherman 102, Scott 83, Gilmer 14, scattering 11; necessary to a choice 106. The House adjourned.

A telegram from St. Louis apprizes us of an insurrectionary attempt, said to have been made by the slaves on Monday night, in Polk County, in the Southwestern angle of Missouri. At 11 o'clock the population of Bolivar was aroused by shouts and other demonstrations in the public square. Hastening thither, a party of negroes were found to have attacked a number of whites, using stones for weapons. A fight ensued; the blacks retreated into the mountains, where, at the latest moment, they were pursued by armed parties. Large numbers had been imprisoned and severely punished. A Vigilance Committee had been organized for the protection of the town.

Our dates from Brownsville to Dec. 23, announce that Cortinas had met with a reverse, and had abandoned the siege of the town.

The New-Mexican mail, as received at St. Louis, reports the route extremely unsafe, the Indians attacking nearly all the passing trains. The last Overland Mail had only got through with a heavy military escort.

A meeting, disapprobatory of the purposes of Brown and his partisans, was held at Rochester on Wednesday evening. Ex-Gov. Hunt and Hon. James Brooks were among the speakers, and the resolutions, which were stringent and pungent, were adopted, over the ineffectual resistance of a minority.

Hon. Wm. H. Seward was yesterday visited at the Astor House by the members of the Republican Committees, on whose behalf Ex-Judge Peabody welcomed him home. Mr. Seward replied briefly. Between 12 M. and 2 P. M. he received the citizens of New-York in the Aldermen's Chamber, City Hall, where, in response to a speech by Mayor Tiemann, he delivered a brief address. At 5 P. M. he set out for his home at Auburn.

A conflagration involving a loss of over half a million of dollars, broke out yesterday in the looking-glass frame manufactory of Messrs. Black, Gramm & Co., No 53 Beekman-street and extending through to Ann-street. The extremely cold weather made it difficult for the firemen to operate successfully, as the hydrants in many cases were frozen, and before the flames could be subdued some fifteen buildings were wholly or in part destroyed, among which were the large paper-warehouses of Cyrus W. Field & Co., and Bulkley, Bro. & Co. How the fire originated has not yet been ascertained. The burnt district is in the form of an oblong, comprising a space of 150 feet front on Beekman-street, and running through to the rear of the buildings directly on the same line in Fulton-street.

Hon. John McLeod Murphy delivered last night a highly interesting lecture on "American Ships and Ship-building," to a large audience, at Clinton Hall. He described the salient points of Naval Architecture to be Safety, Capacity, and Speed, and proceeded to demonstrate how these were best to be obtained. Eckford, Steers, Fulton and other shipbuilders had discriminating praise bestowed on them. The application of steam, as the motive power of ships, brought into review the history of steamships, from the first crossing the ocean by the Savannah, in 1819, though the full consideration of this part of the subject was reserved by the lecturer for another opportunity. The Great Eastern was declared a failure, and a prediction was made that America would yet build larger vessels than that leviathan, and without her faults.

The Stock Market yesterday showed considerable steadiness in demand, and prices on the Share-list left off much the same as on Wednesday. In Money the demand among the Brokers was active, at 6 ₩ cent. on Loans at call, and in some instances 7 ₩ cent. No change in Discounts. Foreign bills very dull.

Corron was inactive. Flour and Wheat were less freely purchased, yet were quite stiffly held. Corn attracted more attention at advanced prices. Provisions were lightly dealt in. Groceries were in rather better request. Hay and Hops were salable and firm. The movements in other branches of trade were restricted.

An Absurd Assertion.—Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, made a most astounding and even ridiculous remark in the House of Representatives yesterday. He stated that it was "unparliamentary" for one member to impeach the motives of another.

The Republican leader is evidently lost in the fog of British oligarchical precedents. If we understand the way in which these things are managed at Washington, and "we think we do," nothing can be more strictly Congressional than for one member to impeach the motives of another. Hardly a day has passed since the present session began, on which one or another member has failed to impeach at least fifty or sixty of his colleagues of being actuated in their parliamentary course by motives which most men, not in Congress, would regard as rather discreditable,—as for instance, treasonable and seditious designs against the Union under which we live, or cheerful intentions of letting loose riot and insurrection upon one great section of our common country.

Law in Utah.

The Secretary of the Interior is in possession of evidence sufficient to convict a Mormon "Saint," named Lee, of having violated and murdered a young girl, a survivor of the party of emigrants massacred at Mountain Meadow, by his fellow-believers, a few months ago. The Mormon authorities refuse to surrender this scoundrel for trial, unless he is to be tried before a Mormon jury; and as no Mormon jury has as yet convicted any Mormon of any outrage on a Gentile, the offer is simply made to enable him to go scot free. In these circumstances, the Secretary urges the immediate propriety of establishing martial law in the Territory, for the protection of life and property. This is precisely what we have been recommending for more than a year. To send Judges out to hold Courts which were the laughing-stock of the "Saints," and by which no Mormon criminal was ever finally brought to justice,—courts, the process of which was treated with contempt in every part of the Territory outside the camp of the United States Army,—was, to say the least, a very grave error. There is nothing more prejudicial to the cause of good order and good government than the exposure of the law and its ministers, for never so short a period, to ridicule. The temporary anarchy of Lynch law does less injury to society than the spectacle of a judge mocked and defied by a rabble. If from the moment the United States troops set foot in Utah, martial law had been maintained, and crime had been punished by drumhead courts-martial, not only would a tide of Gentile emigration have been directed into the valley, but the Mormon mind would have been thoroughly impressed with a vivid sense of the reality of the common law and the acts of Congress. By this time a United States Judge would have been enabled to take his seat in full assurance that he would be respected and obeyed, and we should have had a Christian public growing up in the Territory strong enough to render our further interference in its affairs unnecessary.

The course that has been pursued has, on the contrary, convinced the Mormons of our impotence, rendered the Californian emigrant routes insecure, driven away settlers from the Utah Territory, confirmed the Mormons in their insolence and bigotry, and demoralized the Gentile population by permitting the most outrageous crimes against them to go unpunished. Common justice, common humanity, and respect for our own good name, demand that this state of things should now be put an end to, at whatever cost. We owe it to the Mormons themselves, to the hordes of recruits who are flocking to them every month from all parts of the world, as well as to all citizens of the United States everywhere, to see that there is no portion of our territory in which a peaceful settler may not till his fields and reap his harvests in peace and confidence. We have given the civil law a fair, or rather a grossly unfair, trial, in Utah. We have not only tried it long enough, but too long. It has failed to accomplish its objects, which are the protection of life and property, and the punishment and prevention of crime. The remedy in such cases—and, let us add, the constitutional remedy—is direct martial law. When the courts and police become powerless, it is the duty of every Government to try what the army can do to supply their place, and prepare the way for the restoration of legal authority. There has never been a clearer case made out for the proclamation of martial law than the Mormons have made out for us in Utah, and we do most earnestly urge upon the General Government to follow the advice of the Secretary of the Interior, and proclaim it. Put the army in possession of the country. Bring home the insulted judges, the useless sheriffs, the despised marshals. When a murder or a robbery is committed, instead of negotiating the terms of a trial with the Mormon hierarchy, as we might with Turkey or Japan, follow the perpetrator with as much force as shall be necessary to take him, and when taken, try him before a board of officers, calmly, deliberately, and fairly, and when convicted, punish him instanter. When a crime is committed, of which the Mormons in the vicinity are plainly cognizant, and the criminal cannot be found, go back to Norman William's law,—lay a fine on the whole district, and collect it at the point of the bayonet.

Such a course as this would be something very unusual in this country, but the whole state of affairs in Utah is very unusual and utterly intolerable. The Mormons are an unprecedented fact in our history, and to persist in dealing out the same measure of government to them as we have been in the habit of affording to peaceable Christian people, is very like offering hay and oats to a tiger. The result of the policy now proposed would certainly be one which the whole nation would hail with delight. A few Mormon robbers and murderers, it is true, would be bereft of the trial by jury, and would find the Bill of Rights nullified in their case; but dozens of honest men would have their throats saved from the assassin's knife, and dozens of helpless women would escape rape and massacre. Caravans of peaceable emigrants would travel the high roads and labor on their farms in confidence and security. Moreover, in two or three years, Gentiles would settle in the Valley in sufficiently large numbers to insure their own safety, and to crush out the abomination of Polygamy; and when we withdrew our forces at last, we should leave our judges and marshals in the hands of citizens who would see that their persons were held sacred and their authority respected.

The case now presented by the Secretary of the Interior affords a very curious commentary upon the terms in which his colleague, the Secretary at War, alludes to this standing scandal and disgrace upon the American name. Mr. Floyd admits the utter prostration of every safeguard of civil and personal right in Utah. Nothing could be stronger than his language. He says:

"I am satisfied that the preservation of right and justice, through the means of any jurisprudence known or recognized by the people of the United States, is impossible in that Territory. It is governed, practically, by a system which is in total disregard of the laws or Constitution of the land. The laws of the Mormon Church and the will of the hierarchy are alone potential there. Beyond a mere outward show of acquiescence in Federal authority, they are as irresponsible to it as any foreign nation."

These are words which no American citizen who respects himself or the honor of his country can read without a tingling blush of shame and indignation. They tell us, and they tell the world, that there is a vast region fixed in the heart of this powerful Republic, in which the life of every man and the virtue of every woman lie at the mercy of a vulgar and irresponsible inquisition; in which the American flag floats over the open humiliation of American law; in which officers bearing the commission of the United States look on, idle and impotent witnesses, upon the systematic desecration of American homes.

And what is the inference which a high functionary of the Government draws from such premises as these? The Secretary goes on, with the easiest grace imaginable, to say that, in his opinion, and because of this state of things—

"There is, in the present attitude of affairs, scarcely any necessity for the presence of troops in Utah, and they will be otherwise disposed of in the coming season. There are no complaints of Indian hostilities towards the Mormon people. All other Territories and people upon our vast frontiers suffer from Indian depredations, but the Mormon people enjoy an immunity from all their outrages. For the protection of these people against Indians, there is no necessity for the presence of a single soldier. Murders and robberies of the most atrocious character have been perpetrated in the Territory upon emigrants from the States journeying towards the Pacific, and in some of the most shocking instances by white men disguised as Indians. The general impression, so far as I have been able to ascertain it, amongst those having opportunity to know, is that these murders are the work of the Mormon people themselves, sanctioned, if not directed, by the authority of the Mormon Church.

In plain English, that is, the Secretary at War of the United States recommends that the task of coercing the Mormons into decency and civilization be abandoned by the American Government to the wild Indians of the West. He would have us withdraw our troops, and leave the aboriginal savages at full liberty to attempt what we have not the strength to achieve, and solve the problem of Utah on the principle of the internecine warfare waged by the Kilkenny cats. The Mormons, over whom we have extended our authority, and whose delegate sits in our Legislative Assembly at Washington, have refused to pay the slightest respect to our laws; they outrage our women and murder our men; they make our national highways as unsafe as the sands of the Arabian desert;—and therefore we had better turn the Indians loose upon them, surrender the Territory of Utah to these two hordes of barbarians, fold our arms quietly, and await the result!

We doubt whether a more extraordinary application of the doctrine of laissez-faire than this is to be found in the history of civilized nations; and although it is always, of course, to be regretted that two members of one Government should be found arrayed in open contradiction, one with the other, on a question of practical policy, we think the people of the United States will rejoice exceedingly that the Secretary of the Interior should have rescued us from the ignominy of acquiescing in such a recommendation, even at the price of imperiling the apparent harmony of Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet.

Our Frontier Regions.

There is one section of the country—one great interest—to which the President did not deem it necessary to allude in his Message. We refer to our vast frontier regions. In these regions, comprising an area of more than a million square miles, there is a war raging more costly, in dollars and human life, than that which has distracted Mexico for two years past. Nearly all the funds, labors and energies of the War Department and the Department of the Interior are devoted to that portion of our country, and it is marvelous how a Government and people can, in view of the stupendous facts in finance, plunder, murder and ruin, tolerate in silence from year to year a system so disgraceful and ruinous to the country.

It is true, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster-General have each, in their reports, had more or less to say respecting the frontier regions. The Secretary of the Interior in his report, touching the Indian affairs, says:

"Our relations with the various tribes of Indians within our limits have continued during the past year in a satisfactory condition, and peace has been generally maintained with this dependent people."

This is really a most extraordinary statement! And how an official at the head of the Indian Bureau could put it forth, in view of the accounts of Indian massacres and depredations that come to us by nearly every mail from every quarter of the frontier, it is difficult to conceive.

The Secretary continues:

"Occasional outbreaks have occurred, it is true, and crimes and outrages have been committed; but these have been perpetrated by bands of desperate outlaws, and in no case has a whole nation avowed the purpose of making open and deliberate war upon our settlements."

This statement is no less remarkable than its predecessor, and the whole tenor of the report of the Secretary of War is in refutation of the same, as will be perceived by the following extracts:

"Indian depredations have been committed on our Southern and Mexican border, which as yet have been unchastised for the want of men. I hope to make such an alteration in the disposition of the troops next season as will prevent any repetition of these outrages in future on that frontier.

It has been truly said that to call ours a peace establishment is a mere abuse of terms. All the incidents pertaining to an active war establishment characterize our service throughout the year, excepting only the casualties upon the battle field; and these, in our service, are far from being few or insignificant.

* * * * * * *

The war which, last year, was going on with the Camanches and Kiowas is still unfinished, but the theatre of it is extended from the Western part of our Texan boundary to the region lying towards the head waters of the Arkansas and Canadian rivers. Proper measures have been taken to subdue those tribes, and to give perfect protection to the routes from Missouri and Arkansas to New-Mexico.

Large sums are necessarily and unavoidably expended every year for objects it is impossible to foresee or estimate for. During the past year the extra expenses incurred for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Washington and Oregon amounted to two hundred and ninety-eight thousand five hundred and thirty-nine dollars and eleven cents beyond what would have occurred, but for these wars."

In addition to all this, there have been two expeditions sent out from California against the Mojaves, who are now in open war, and no nearer being whipped than ever. The whole Apache nation carries on an incessant warfare against the whites, and several companies of United States troops are now in the Apache country with belligerent intent. It is safe to predict they will not catch an Indian. The Camanches and Apaches, Kiowas and other tribes are constantly stealing the stock on the Overland Mail routes, attacking passengers, stations and emigrant trains. The Kansas and Stockton route, according to the following report of the Postmaster-General, has been broken up mainly by the Indians:

"This route, put in operation at an annual expense of $79,999, having, in consequence of the alleged hostility of the Indians and other causes, proved a failure, and being unnecessary for postal purposes, it was, on the 30th of June last, discontinued."

Here, then, we have the Secretary of the Interior declaring that we have no such thing as an Indian war on our hands; the Secretary-at-War magnifying his office by the directly contradictory assertion, that to say that our army is on "a peace establishment, is a mere abuse of terms," our frontiers being ravaged by a chronic state of war with the Indians—the theatre of which instead of being curtailed, steadily "extending;" and the Postmaster-General accounting for the abandonment of important mail routes by the hostilities raging between these Indians and ourselves! Here is a chaos of Secretaries with a vengeance, and the question naturally arises, in whom are we to put our faith?

The Secretary of the Interior helps us on a little way towards the resolution of this doubt, by explaining his particular notions of a "state of peace." In another part of his report he continues as follows:

"The attacks upon isolated mail and trading stations and emigrant trains have never, even when resulting in murder and pillage, shown signs of premeditation, or appeared to be the working out of a general and preconcerted plan. And when all the circumstances are taken into consideration—the immense number of our people who are constantly traversing the prairies of the interior; their careless, unguarded, and often provoking bearing; the natural irritation of the Indians, who attribute to their presence the rapid diminution of game, and the consequent hunger and want to which they are subjected; the impossibility of restraining them from violence under these circumstances, except by the presence of an armed force, and the numerical weakness and scattered condition of our army—the wonder is, not that so many, but so few cases of violence have occurred."

The Secretary admits that isolated mail and trading stations and emigrant trains have been attacked, and that some horrible massacres have occurred during the past year, on routes leading through Utah Territory. But the Secretary has not been able to discover that the Indians, in murdering and plundering, really went into the business with any design or preconcerted plan. According to the Secretary's idea, they only stumbled into these insignificant recreations accidentally! The poor fellows, they meant no great harm, and, under the circumstances, it is really a wonder they did not follow up the whites, and butcher and plunder more of them. This is cool, decidedly so, coming from the head of the Indian Bureau, comfortably quartered in Washington, and quite consoling to the murdered emigrant, whose bones lie bleaching on the frontier wilds.

The explanation of this singular conflict of reports is, fortunately, not altogether out of our reach. It may be summed up in a very few words, and a potent array of eloquent numerals. The Army and Indian agencies have one interest, and the emigrant and bona fide settler another. The former are always accredited at the home departments, the latter never. No community of frontier settlers—those who pave the way to empire—have ever as yet been able to induce this Government to listen to their wrongs, or turn a willing ear to their requirements. There is a power that overrides them, crushes them out; and this power is to be found in the following exhibit of the moneys expended by the War Department, the expenditures of the Department of the Interior, the greater portion of which, say $8,000,000 per annum, paid to Indians, being included. The table is for ten years, commencing with 1850:

|---|---|
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1850, | $12,801,764 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1851. | 11,811,793 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1852. | 13,424,075 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1853. | 15,476,826 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1854. | 14 342,684 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1855. | 18,900,565 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1856. | 20,821,024 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1857. | 24,619,049 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1858. | 31,537,306 |
| Expenditures of the War Department, 1859. | 27,997,794 |

These magnificent figures speak for themselves, and afford a clue to the peculiar reports of the Secretaries and the silence of the President's Message relative to frontier interests. It will not do to trench upon this powerful branch of the Government patronage. Some surprising leaps have been made in the figures of the War Department, since the present Administration came into power. The high figures for 1858 are partly owing to the Mormon war, which is said to have cost $4,000,000, and so far from any lasting or practical good having come out of this expenditure, the money might as well have been cast into the sea. At the present rate of increase, the expenses of the War Department will reach $60,000,000 in 1865, and if the relative increase of the expenditures of the War Department, in comparison with those of the other departments, continues, in a few years the former will absorb by far the larger portion of the entire revenue of the Government. And it is precisely this result which will come from the establishment of military posts in Sonora and Chihuahua. It would give an enormous impulse to our already extravagant and ruinous military system.

If any Congressman wishes to do his country an immense service and immortalize himself, let him take the statements of the Secretary of the Interior as the basis for a special inquiry into the condition of frontier interests. The report of the Secretary relative to this subject is so flagrantly incorrect, that an excellent opportunity is offered for a searching inquiry, which must result in a total overthrow of a system so entirely opposed to frontier interests, and the interests of the whole country. The attempt will raise a hornet's nest, and the work will prove Herculean, but the end to be gained ought to command the requisite talent, courage and patriotism.

Mild Morals.

The report of the decision of the Court-martial upon Capt. Wyse, of the Third Artillery, reminds us very strongly of the story of the gentleman who detected a friend in criminal relations with his wife, and on taking him to task for it, declared that if he persisted in his conduct there would certainly be a coolness between them. The Court-martial found Capt. Wyse guilty of signing false certificates of transportation, or in other words, aiding and abetting in a gross swindle of the most disreputable kind. For this the gallant officer has been sentenced to be reprimanded in general orders, confined in arrest at his post on San Juan island, and suspended from rank and pay till the first of January next; and the Court "admonished him that persistence in his course would eventually lead to his dismissal from the Army!"

It is greatly to be regretted that the Court did not take the opportunity which the trial offered, of fixing the exact time during which an officer of the United States Army might make false and fraudulent certificates with impunity. We think most people will learn with painful surprise, that it is possible for an officer and a gentleman to obtain money under false pretences even once, without insuring his instant dismissal from the service. The offences with which a court-martial may fairly deal leniently are those into which a hot or impulsive temperament may lead men—drunkenness, violence, neglect of duty, or insubordination. The best of soldiers may be guilty of these once, twice or thrice, without shaking anybody's confidence in his sterling integrity; but when a man sits down and deliberately signs his name to assist in carrying out a petty swindle, the sooner he is banished from the society of gentlemen the better. There can be no guarantee except fear that he will not repeat the offence, and the personal honor of United States officers ought not to be upheld in any such way. Any variety of what jurists call the crimen falsi ought to be a disqualification for military command. In some European armies the dishonor of a draft, even if drawn in perfect good faith, is sufficient to drive an officer from the service. This is too rigid a rule; but the rule that no man who has once had the imputation of deliberate fraud fastened on him shall remain in the army one minute after conviction, is a rule the enforcement of which is absolutely necessary, as long as unsullied honor and strong esprit de corps are supposed to have anything to do with making good soldiers. A few such decisions as this will do a good deal to lower the tone of the service, by humiliating the gallant men who belong to it.

In making these remarks, it is hardly necessary to say that we know nothing whatever of Capt. Wyse, beyond the fact that he belongs to the Third Artillery, and signed false certificates, and will be dismissed the service if he keeps at it.

That Marble City!

Cæsar Augustus has much to answer for, besides the complete destruction of the rather decaying liberties of Rome. He put a phrase into circulation of which we do not believe the last will ever be heard till the last man shall expire in uttering it. This ubiquitous observation turned up again yesterday, in Mr. Seward's little speech at the Astor House. After stating what was to be expected, that he was much more pleased to get back to New-York than he had been to leave it, and also begging everybody to "be assured that he had seen nothing equal to the prosperity and magnificence of his own native land," in all his tour from Cornhill to Cairo, the distinguished Senator exclaimed that

"Twenty-six years ago, when he went to London, he found it built of stone, and when he returned here he found this City built of brick. Now, when he visited London and Paris, he still found them built of stone, and he had left New-York built of marble."

Whereat, of course, "great applause" from the listening crowd. Now, we have no sort of objection to the most demonstrative glorification of our dear native New-York, which both ought to be, and is, the metropolis of mankind; but in the name of fashion, the Fifth-avenue, and brown-stone fronts, we protest against this echo of the Imperial architect of Rome. It probably was not true when Augustus said it, that he had "found Rome brick, and left it marble;" and it certainly has never been true of any city since, and of no city is it less true than of New-York, which has wisely profited by the "dreadful example" of that "whited sepulchre," our neighbor of Philadelphia, and clings to the picturesque of brick and stone.

Severe Distress.

Our Abolitionist contemporary, the Herald, is extremely angry because the Washington letter-writers are laughing good-naturedly at the ridiculous contrast between its magnificent promises and its meek performance in the matter of Congressional reports. This is very unnecessary; for it is perfectly natural that in its zeal for hunting up the incendiary Abolition harangues made by tinkers in the rural districts, the Herald should find no time to attend to the affairs of Congress.

In the extremity of its distress, our dilapidated contemporary snatches at the most futile chances of saving its credit, and yesterday actually quoted as an indorsement of its "Congressional reports" a remark which fell from Hon. Extra Billy Smith, of Virginia, in the intervals of his egg-nogg. Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, quoted his own language of the day before from the authentic record in the Congressional Globe, upon which Mr. Extra Billy interfered, with the Herald, by way of setting Mr. Grow right about his own words, and, of course, get snubbed for his pains. We are afraid that this case solves the difficult problem of making a perfectly worthless note more worthless still by its indorsement.

The Atlantic Monthly.—The New Year begins in the Atlantic Monthly with a goodly show of varied and valuable papers. Of the making of magazines no end as yet appears, though an end thereof has been often prophecied by the seers, and there can be no reasonable question that such a periodical as the Atlantic, with well-vindicated claims to impartiality of tone, as well as ability of treatment in dealing with the current of literature and life, must do a great deal of practical good, and fill a positive place in the machinery of civilization.

The opening number for 1860 shows an unabated spirit both in managers and contributors. The Professor has got up from his long breakfast, and gone fairly out of doors with the intention of writing a novel. The first chapters of this new development of his quaint, well-stored, sprightly and analytic mind promise well. They threaten also, of course, more of disquisition than of dramatic movement; but as the writer warms to his work, we may reasonably hope to see the poet in him suppress the philosopher, and produce a "Professor's Story" that will hold and reward our attention. The "Filibustering Experiences" of "Samuel Absalom" are continued with emphasis, as well as the discursive and agreeable "Roba di Roma." There are verses, too, and clever critical notices, including a just and vivid appreciation of Palmer's speaking and wonderful statue, the "White Captive." The critic disposes summarily and very properly of the contradictory clamors which have been raised about the proportions of this noble work, which represents neither a matron, nor a child, but a maiden in the full bloom of her perfected youth, whose frame is very far from being at rest in the harmonious undulations of its natural outline, but quivers and thrills in every muscle and nerve with the passions of shame, indignation, and the defiant pride of sex and race.

An Editorial Exit.—Mr. George F. Thomson, who has for some time past been associated with the editorial department of the New-York Daily News, yesterday took leave of that journal and of the editorial profession in order to enter upon the duties of an office which will bring him into close relations with the Mayor elect. Mr. Thomson, in a few kindly words of farewell, says that he has the satisfaction of leaving the News stronger than he found it; and bids his brethren of the desk adieu in the following courteous and considerate terms:

"To the editorial fraternity I feel that I am their debtor for many kindly acts and generous words of encouragement, and if ever, in the heat and acrimony of political contests, I have drawn a barbed arrow from the editorial quiver, and sped it on its way to rankle in the breast of a political foe, I would now desire to pluck it out and place it at the feet of him I may have wounded."

This very natural language suggests a doubt, does it not? whether it is ever worth while to "speed barbed arrows on their way;" or make the battles of the Press, as we are all of us constantly tempted into doing, sheer tilts and tourneys of the pen, for the amusement of the idle public, and to the great grief of the "judicious."

NEWS BY TELEGRAPH.

Negro Insurrection in Missouri.

UPRISING AT BOLIVAR—THE SLAVES FLEE TO THE MOUNTAINS—A VIGILANCE COMMITTEE FORMED.

St. Louis, Thursday, Dec. 29.

The Missouri Democrat has the following from the Warsaw Dispatch:

"About 11 o'clock on Monday night the citizens of Bolivar were aroused by shouting and the throwing of stones on the public square. A large crowd soon congregated, and found that a gang of negroes had attacked a few white men. When a sufficient number of whites was collected they attacked the negroes, driving them into the woods. The negroes threatened to burn the town before morning. A vigilant watch was kept, and all attempts failed. One negro was dangerously wounded by a pistol shot. Several were captured and confined in jail. The citizens held a meeting and appointed a Vigilance Committee, who were taking active measures to discover those engaged in the riot. A mounted company was ranging the woods in search of negroes. The owner of some rebellious slaves was badly wounded, and only saved himself by flight. Several blacks have been severely punished. The greatest excitement prevailed, and every man was armed and prepared for a more serious attack."

At the latest advices, however, the excitement had somewhat subsided.

Union Demonstration at Rochester.

SPEECHES OF EX-GOV. HUNT AND HON. JAMES BROOKS—RESOLUTIONS.

Rochester, Thursday, Dec. 29.

A large Union meeting was held in this city last evening, which was addressed by James Brooks and Ex-Gov. Hunt. The resolutions adopted were of rather a mixed character, but the principal one is the following:

Resolved, That we cannot too strongly rebuke the sentiment, that the election of a President by a constitutional majority having views of public policy with which the minority do not coincide would furnish a just cause for the dissolution of our Union. We, on the contrary, hold such sentiments to be disorganizing and traitorous odious to all patriotic and Union-loving men, and disgraceful to the civilization of the age; and we hereby give to our fellow-citizens, East, West, North and South, our most solemn pledge that whoever may be elected President of these United States, in a constitutional way, shall receive from us, in the lawful discharge of his duties, the same willing obedience and energetic support which we have given to each and all of his predecessors; and we hereby declare our firm and unalterable purpose to sustain and protect him, in the lawful discharge of those duties, from all enemies within or without, at home or abroad.

There was an effort to lay this resolution on the table, but it passed by a large majority, and then the meeting adjourned.

The New-Mexican Mail.

Independence, Thursday, Dec. 29.

The New-Mexican Mail with dates of the 5th inst., arrived here to-day. The Navajo Indians are again hostile, having killed one man and wounded others, who went to trade with them. The outgoing mail, which left here four weeks ago, was attacked by the Indians beyond the Arkansas River. An escort was with the mail and the Indians were repulsed. None of the Mail party were hurt. This mail came with Moss & Reese's train to the crossing of the Arkansas, and from thence by the air line, no Indians were seen. The Mail party experienced very cold weather, and their mules were kept from freezing with difficulty.

RECEPTION OF THE TREATY AMONG THE REACTIONISTS—FORCED LEVIES AT THE CAPITAL—DEFEAT OF COBOS AT TEHUANTEPEC.

A letter from Jalapa, where Robles Pezuela, late Mexican Minister at Washington, commands, says that when the news of the conclusion of the treaty with the United States reached that city, expresses were at once sent forward in all haste to the Capital, where, as at all the other cities on the route, the news created the greatest excitement among the Reactionists. The letter adds:

"Poor Conservatives! They are dreadfully frightened, but they scarcely see the beginning of the drama yet.

Above all, the handful of officials that we have here, in wrath at the arrangement we have effected with the United States, breathe the direst vengeance against 'the traitors at Vera Cruz.' They do not say this openly, but at night, as they perambulate the streets, in order to show, I suppose, that Don Quijote still lives.

As to the effect of the treaty, there cannot be a doubt that now it has just been concluded, England will also recognize the Constitutional Government. It is not possible for her to take any other road than that worked out by the Republic of the North—above all that she can no longer continue her protection to the vandalic faction of Mexico."

A letter from the City of Mexico says:

"The military levies continue here with unabated violence. The members of the Commission penetrate even to the hearthstones of the unhappy citizens, and seize them in the bosom of their families, and hurry them off to the army. A few days since a poor shoemaker, living on the road to San Dieguito, was seized by one of these man-hunters and, on resisting, was struck with a machete, and in this horrible state was conducted to the hospital, thence to be impressed into service when he shall have recovered."

Another letter from the capital records the death, in a prison in that city, of Gen. Victoria Tapia, who was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Queretaro. The letter adds that he died in the greatest suffering, nor was he permitted to see his family, who sought admission to the prison. Such is Mexican warfare.

A letter in the Vera Cruz Reforma Social confirms the news we have already published of the defeat on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The Constitutionalist troops were commanded by D. Porfirio Diaz; those of Cobos by Capts. Manzana and Trujequ. The engagement took place near the village of Mistequilla. The Tehuantepec troops had been reinforced from Juchitan and Oajaca. The rout of the Reactionists was complete, and both their superior officers fell on the field.

Naval Intelligence.

CRUISE OF THE SUMPTER AND MYSTIC.

UNITED STATES STEAMSHIP SUMPTER, CAPE PALMAS, Liberia, Friday, Oct. 14, 1859.

We arrived here in our little steamer during a very heavy rain, but fortune seems to have been in our favor, and we were blessed with a fair afternoon. Commander ARMSTRONG immediately proceeded to land his mails and other important dispatches. He was heartily welcomed at the Mission House by Rev. J. RAMBO, a gentleman who has lately arrived here in the M. C. Stevens. Capt. ARMSTRONG, and the officers accompanying him, were hospitably entertained at dinner under the auspices of Mrs. RAMBO. After the meal, were asked by the Rev. gentlemen to attend a school of young colored girls, all orphans, to the number of 47.

It was their day for sewing lessons, and, at the request of Mrs. RAMBO, the colored juveniles favored us with a song, which, although executed by Africans, yet would have done honor to a great many of our schools.] Our gentlemanly commander, on leaving, made a few admonitory remarks to them—praised them for their good behavior, and expressed his desire for their future success. After thus spending a few happy hours in the society of ladies, (which is something unusual with officers on this coast, for ladies of our color are seldom to be met with,) we returned on board, and soon were on our dreary way.

Coal, which is neither bituminous nor anthracite, is reported as being found here not far from the seashore—likewise at Monrovia. It gives a peculiar bright and very hot flame, and it appears to be peculiar to this country. It would be a blessing to Liberia, and a saving to our Government, to establish a coal depôt at either of these two places.

A sad accident occurred here lately during the stay of the United States corvette Portsmouth, about the middle of August. The gunner fell overboard and was drowned before help reached him.

FERNANDO PO, Friday, Oct. 28, 1859.

The U. S. steamers Sumpter and Mystic arrived here a few days ago, to take in their supplies of coal. Since the arrival of the new Spanish Governor, the coal has been landed here from our merchant vessels, and permission has been granted for a depôt. The bark Louisa Bliss is here unloading her coal, and will sail in a few weeks for Charleston. The harbor is filled with men-of-war of all nations, and displays a large show of colored bunting.

Health Convention—Correction.

To the Editor of the New York Times:

Permit me to correct a somewhat serious error which your reporter has made in relation to my remarks in the Health Convention at the Cooper Institute. I am reported as having "defied the drug physicians to explain the theory of any one disease, or the effect of any one medicine." What I did say has a very different meaning. I said that no drug physician from anything taught in his books or schools, could explain the nature (not theory) of any one disease, nor the action (not effect) of any one medicine.

Respectfully, &c., R. T. TRALL, M. D.,

THE UNION LEAGUE.

"Indignantly frowning upon the dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."—Washington.

"The Union must and shall be preserved."—Jackson.

PREAMBLE AND
DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES OF THE UNION LEAGUE.

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, believing that the object of the adoption of the American Constitution by our forefathers was to "establish justice, to secure DOMESTIC TRANQUILLITY, to combine for the common defence, to aid in the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty" to themselves and "their posterity;" have, in view of the dangers which now threaten the stability and integrity of the Union, which dangers they believe are the legitimate results of the false teachings and the political fanaticism of Northern Abolitionists and Anti-Slavery agitators, been moved by a consideration of these conditions of our political affairs, and a recognition of the solemn responsibility resting upon us as citizens and as individuals, to renew our declarations of immutable attachment to the Constitution as expounded by our forefathers and the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Union as it has existed in the minds of the patriots gone before us; and to pledge ourselves to resist by all just, legal and constitutional means, every attempt that may hereafter be made to infringe upon the sovereign rights of any State or Territory, or the constitutional rights of any section, by enactments based upon loose constructions of the Federal Constitution, or to subvert in any manner whatsoever, those powers which were reserved by the people at the time when the General Government was organized. And that we may be the better able to enforce the principles thus enunciated, we have constituted ourselves into a political association, the duties of which shall be to preserve intact the constitutional safeguards of our Republican Government, basing our political action upon the belief that our highest merits as free-born citizens, consist in an unyielding opposition to the wicked and artful machinations of tyrants and traitors.

And in order to attain our end in the wisest and most patriotic manner, we do hereby subscribe our names, and solicit all true citizens to join us in this act, most solemnly pledging "our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honors" to maintain the principles set forth in and accompanying this preamble.

First—We will not cast our votes or give our support to any man whose political antecedents are not in harmony with the principles herein set forth, unless he has become, and is, at the time of our granting him such support, a member of this Association in good standing.

Second—These principles are: 1st. To maintain strictly a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States: holding, however, to the doctrine that it is the duty of every good citizen to obey implicitly all laws which may have been enacted by all legally-constituted bodies having law-making powers, until such enactments are annulled by the decisions of the higher Courts of the State in which such laws were enacted, or by the Supreme Court of the United States. And in the contingency of a conflict of the laws of Congress with those of any State, we assume and believe that every citizen should conform to the requirements of the former, and disregard those of the latter. 2d. To discountenance and oppose all acts, professions, publications or proceedings calculated to impair the interests or infringe upon the sovereign rights of any State or section of this Union; whether such acts, professions, publications or proceedings emanate from the Legislature of any State or States, or any citizen as thereof, or from the Government of the United States; and to rebuke with promptness and decision any attempt which may be made to weaken or sever the fraternal ties which bind us together as a community of States.

Third.—To maintain inviolate the inherent right of the citizens of any State to remove their property into any Territory of the United States without distinction as to the nature of said property, and to hold the same in said Territory, subject to all possible contingencies of limitations and restrictions, and entitled to the same guarantees; the nature of all such property being determined according to the laws of the State from whence it was taken.

Fourth.—To discountenance the desecration of the Sacred Desk by the introduction of secular controversies, which should be devoted to the Holy Doctrines of Him who taught "peace and good will to all men," and who refrained Himself from all participation in political affairs.

The subscribers hereto do further pledge themselves to conform in every particular to the requirements of the Constitution and By-Laws, or Rules and Regulations belonging to this Association.

THE UNION.

On Wednesday evening, Dec. 28, 1859, "The Union Club, No. 1, of the City of New-York," was duly organized according to the preamble and declaration of principles of the "Union League," and the following officers unanimously elected for the ensuing year:

JOHN RADWAY, Jr., President.
JOHN D. VOSE, Vice-President.
DANL. S. MARVIN, Treasurer, and ALEX. BULL, Secretary.

It was moved and seconded that the proceedings of this meeting be published in the New-York Herald, Day Book, Daily News, Times, Express, Journal of Commerce, New-York Leader, Sunday Times, Atlas Courier and Mercury.

CITY INTELLIGENCE.

THE ANTICIPATED REMOVALS IN THE MAYOR'S OFFICE.—The paragraphs which appeared in the newspapers yesterday, in relation to the changes which Mr. WOOD proposes to make in the Mayor's office, created much excitement and comment among the frequenters of the City Hall. It was stated by those who are in a position to be well informed, that Mr. J. B. AULD, Secretary, Mr. HINCHMAN and one or two others, would be invited to remain in the office, if so disposed; but that Marshal W. H. STEVENS' resignation would be accepted. This apparent confirmation of the rumor of the day before, drew expressions of regret from many of all political parties who have business to do at the Mayor's office, which brings them in connection with Marshal STEVENS. Mr. STEVENS has occupied the position of Marshal for nearly seven years. He has served one term under Mayor WESTERVELT, two terms under Mayor WOOD, and one term under Mayor TIEMANN.

THE STEAMER GRANADA.—This steamer, sunk at the Chambers-street Dock on Wednesday evening, remains much the same as at last accounts. Additional casts have been got out to prevent her from sliding off into deeper water, and yesterday all articles of furniture, bedding, &c., which could be reached, were secured. The severe cold and accumulating ice which covers portions of the vessel are very great obstacles to prosecuting the task of raising her. Last evening the arrangements were nearly completed, and as soon as the steam-pumps can be set to work, it is believed she will be raised without difficulty. Capt. MCGOWAN, on finding the vessel in a sinking condition, ordered all the side-ports closed, which will facilitate operations. The damage to cargo and vessel, and the expense of repairs, are estimated at about $20,000.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FESTIVALS.—The children of the "Wilson Industrial School for Girls" enjoyed an annual festival yesterday, in the School building No. 137 Avenue A. Owing to the liberal contributions of the friends of the school on the occasion of the fair recently held for the benefit of the Institution, the building was tastefully decorated, and the children were well provided for. The festival exercises consisted of singing and recitations by the scholars, and addresses by their friends. The children of the East River Industrial School also had a festival at their school-room in Fortieth-street, near Third-avenue, which afforded a great deal of pleasure, not only to the scholars themselves, but to the managers and visiting friends of the Institution.

THE HEALTH CONVENTION.—Dr. J. C. JACKSON, at the Water Cure Establishment in Laight-street, last evening, discoursed upon the laws of life and health, more particularly as they relate to the use of flesh as an article of diet. In recounting his own personal experience, he stated that he had not partaken of meat for 12 years, had drunk neither teanor coffee for ten years; and that he had abstained from all condiments for nearly the same period, to the great advantage of his physical health. He eats but two meals a day, and endeavors to live so simply that, should he ever be so unfortunate as to have no money, he could even exist without it. The audience, which was composed principally of medical students, male and female, filled the hall, and manifested the liveliest interest in the address.

ICE.—Large quantities of ice have formed during the last three days and nights, upon the flats, and along the shores of the Bay. These masses are freed from the shores by the rising tide, and the ebb carries them down the Bay, rendering it a difficult task for vessels to pass up or down without the aid of steam. In the effort to board the steamer Arago, as she passed the NEWS Station at Sandy Hook, Mr. FARRELL, the news boatman at that point, became involved in the floating masses of ice, and came near perishing. He only reached the shore after both hands had been badly frost-bitten.

SALE OF BROOKLYN FERRY LEASES AGAIN POSTPONED.—The Brooklyn Ferry leases now held by the Union Ferry Company, were advertised to be sold yesterday. When the time was fixed for the sale, on the occasion of the previous postponement, it was thought that a decision on the motion for an injunction would have been given, but as it had not been received yesterday, the Comptroller determined upon another postponement until the 10th of January.

THE UNION LEAGUE.—The Union Club No. 1 of the City of New-York was organized on Wednesday evening last, on the platform of the Union League, by the election of JOHN RADWAY Jr., for President, JOHN D. VOSE, Vice-President; DANIEL S. MARVIN, Treasurer; and ALEXANDER HULL, Secretary. The objects of the Union League are set forth by its declaration of principles, which is published elsewhere.

INSTALLATION.—Rev. J. COTTON SMITH, who was recently elected Rector of the Church of the Ascension, was installed yesterday with the usual ceremonies. The attendance of laity and clergymen was large.

Coroners' Inquests.

SARAH BASSINSKY, a little girl, died yesterday at the residence of her parents, No. 167 West Thirty-fifth-street, from injuries received on Wednesday evening by her clothes having ignited at a grate. The child was alone in the room when the accident occurred. An inquest was held by Coroner JACKMAN.... About a week ago Mrs. KNOX, a lady 45 years of age, residing in Oliver-street, received such serious burns, in consequence of her dress coming in contact with a stove, that she died yesterday. Coroner GAMBLE held an inquest.

Police Reports.

ALLEGED SWINDLERS ARRESTED.

Two men, who gave their names as Egan and Bliss, were arrested last evening, on a charge of having swindled different merchants out of various amounts. They are charged with purchasing goods, and with offering in payment for them forged checks of about double the amount of the bills, thus securing the merchandise, and the balance in money. One of them, it is said, went to Mr. White, the hatter, and purchased two hats, tendering in exchange a check for $25 on the banking-house of Messrs. Clapp & Brothers, Broadway. Mr. White sent his clerk to the house in question, but he was informed that business hours were over, and that if he would return the next day the check would be cashed. On this information the balance was handed to the customer, but on presentation the next day, the paper was found to be worthless. When Egan and Bliss were searched, memoranda were found on them of the names of the different parties whom they had succeeded in swindling. Among them was Mr. White, Mr. De Graff of $175, Mr. Brooks of $17, and others of minor amounts.

ARREST OF AN ALLEGED FEMALE PICKPOCKET.

About two weeks ago a Mrs. Hunt, of Rye, Westchester County, had her pocket picked of $250, at the store of Ubsdell, Pelrson & Lake, on Broadway. Detective Philip Farley took the matter in charge, and yesterday succeeded in arresting a woman named Margaret Lee, on suspicion of having committed the robbery. During the afternoon she was confronted by Mrs. Hunt, who identified her as the person whom she saw near her in the store at the time. She was accordingly locked up to answer.

American Ships and Ship-Building.

LECTURE BY HON. JOHN M'LEOD MURPHY.

Pursuant to an invitation, signed by Hon. GEO. BANCROFT, GEO. FOLSOM, Commodore VANDERBILT, AUGUST BELMONT, HENRY GRINNELL and other prominent citizens, Hon. JOHN MCLEOD MURPHY, Senator elect to the State Legislature, last night delivered a lecture at Clinton Hall on the subject of "American Ships and Ship-Building." The Hall will hold about three hundred and fifty people, and it was crowded, many ladies being among the audience. The lecturer commenced by stating that his subject was so widespread and comprehensive that he could only make but a transient contract with it. If we analyze the salient points of the naval architecture of the best American ships, we find that they are these: 1st, Safety; 2d, Capacity; 3d, Speed. The perfection and the beauty of American models have always challenged the admiration of the world, while for speed they have won equal renown. In scientific terms, Mr. MURPHY proceeded to describe the merits of different vessels, and to illustrate the mode of modeling and building. He highly eulogized the late GEORGE STEERS, one of whose plans, in naval architecture, was humanely conceived, so to fashion a ship that in case of wreck she would go to the beach with her head on, and be saved from breaking to pieces. The name of STEERS will always live with honor in America. Had his life been spared he would have won the highest honors. [Applause.]

Alluding, en passant, to ocean steamers, Mr. MURPHY said that in June, 1819, the steamer Savannah successfully demonstrated the possibility of crossing the ocean by steam. She was built by HICKETT & CROCKETT, at the Novelty Iron Works, and differed much from steamships now-a-days. her wheels being unprotected by guards. In those Union-saving days, the Savannah fully represented the talent of Northern builders, and the enterprise of Southern merchants. [Applause.]

Up to 1816 a wooden model of a ship was unknown in this City, all vessels being built from designs on paper. The first model was made by CHRISTIAN BURKE, with the assistance of Dr. VINCENT. To HENRY ECKFORD, the father of naval architecture in this country, we are indebted for that style of ship building which is purely American. To ECKFORD and FULTON America owes a debt never to be paid. [Applause.] Mr. MURPHY proceeded to give a sketch of ECKFORD's life, from the time that he worked at a boat-builder's shop, in Dover-street, for $1 25 a day till he died in Constantinople in 1832. He gave to this country that naval supremacy which is acknowledged over the civilized world. In the war of 1812, he contracted with the United States Government to construct war-ships for the Lakes, and his fame is thus linked with that of PERRY and MACDONOUGH.

The first steamship built in this country was the Clermont, in 1807, by ROBERT FULTON. The speed of steamships in 1812 and 1819 may be judged of from captions in the newspapers. Here is one of them: "Twenty-four hours later from Albany, with news of Gen SCOTT's proceedings. Very late intelligence." CHRISTIAN BURKE's first essay in New-York was a pilot-boat, and to him is owing the race of that useful class of vessels. Our ferry-boats we owe to R. L. STEVENS and his cotemporaries. The City of Brooklyn, since 1824, has been built up by the ferry-boats. It was only a village before. Its importance has been made by the application of steam to ferry-boats.

It was not unreasonable, the lecturer thought, to predict that boats would soon be built that would run 25 miles an hour.

Apropos of the Great Eastern, Mr. MURPHY considered her the saddest failure of all commercial and mechanical speculations, and he was sorry she was so. He had reason to know that our mechanics mingled their condemnation of her with very great regret. There were many reasons why she must prove a failure. The time allowed for her in port would not be sufficient for her to take in freight and get a complement of passengers. A smaller vessel would make the voyage while she was filling. She is also a failure in her model. Her draft of water is ten feet too much. Each cubic foot of water would strike her sides with a resistance of sixty-four pounds. The resistance of wind against her sides was twenty pounds to the square inch. She is deficient in strength, and cannot work the side wheels and screw with equal speed. That "irrepressible conflict" [laughter] opened up some interesting mechanical questions regarding the possible remedy. If anything could be done, it would be the taking away the screw, and applying the whole steam force to the wheels alone, if, indeed, the boilers were strong enough to resist the pressure of the accumulated steam. But there were still radical defects in her model, which defied all correction. A larger ship would yet be built in this country, but her keel would not be laid till it was clearly shown that she could be made to pay.

Iron steamships are not, it would appear, favorites with Mr. MURPHY. While usually we consume less coal in our steamships than either England or France do in theirs, the outfit of our vessels cannot compare with that of England. In that country the officers are retained in one ship, so that they get a perfect familiarity with her; with us, too often, Captain and crew come on board together.

The lecturer glowingly eulogized the artisans and mechanics of our ship-yards. There may be found there men of intelligence, physical endurance and steady habits, who must challenge admiration. [Applause.] Men who know that the greatness of the nation depends much, very much, on their strong arms and steady eyes. Nor were the merchants of the country to be forgotten. Their patriotism and liberality in encouraging ship-building were great. It was to be regretted that the Government of the United States had not established a school of instruction for youth in naval architecture,—an institution which should, in its devotion to art, be free from all political influences. Nobody who loves Art would insult the artist of the Heart of the Andes, or of the Greek Slave, by asking what ticket they voted, or to what political body they belonged.

Mr. MURPHY gave an interesting account of his early connection with the sea; his love of the works of FALCONER, DIBDIN and Capt. BASIL HALL, and after the recitation of a nautical poem, concluded a lecture which was listened to with great interest, and which was continually interrupted with hearty applause.

DESTRUCTIVE CONFLAGRATION.

Six First-class Warehouses Destroyed with their Contents—Tenement Houses Burned to the Ground—Loss $500,000.

The City was visited by a conflagration yesterday, which in its extent surpasses any that has occurred since the great fire in the Winter of 1845, and by which not less than half a million dollars' worth of property has been consumed. About 4½ o'clock a German woman, living in Ann-street, observed flames issuing from the second story windows of the building No. 83 Ann-street, occupied by Messrs. BLACK, GRAMM & Co. as a manufactory of gilt mouldings for looking-glass frames. An alarm was raised which met with a ready response from the Fire Department, several Companies of which are stationed in the neighborhood. The intense cold, however—the thermometer at this time having been at 7° below zero—seriously retarded the effective operation of the firemen, and it was not until much time had been spent in thawing out the hydrants, which were found to be frozen up, by means of fires banked around them, that any water could be obtained. Meantime, with this unfortunate state of affairs in their favor, the flames had rapidly attained headway, and in less than an hour the structure in which the conflagration had originated, extending from Beekman to Ann-street, was completely destroyed. Thence the fire communicated to the buildings adjoining on either side, and a range of tall warehouses, having a front of 125 feet on Beekman-street, and extending through the block to Ann-street, became a mass of smoking ruins before the flames could be subjugated. Unfortunately, the destruction of property was not confined to this block. Leaping across Ann-street, the fire swept through to the rear of several stores in Fulton-street, destroying the intermediate buildings, when happily its further progress was arrested. Its origin has not been ascertained.

We append in detail a list of the buildings destroyed, with such particulars as have as yet been ascertained:

ON BEEKMAN-STREET.

No. 53.—The picture-frame manufactory of Messrs. BLACK, GRAMM & Co. Loss on stock and tools, about $40,000, upon which an insurance of $31,000 had been effected in the following Companies:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| American | $3,000 | North American | $2,000 |
| Brooklyn | 3,000 | North River | 2,000 |

No. 55.—The paper and rag warehouse of BULKLEY, BRO. & Co. Loss estimated at $80,000. Insured in City companies for $72,500. As the policies are contained in the iron safe which yet remains in the ruins, a correct list of the names of the companies cannot be given.

No. 57.—The paper warehouse of CYRUS W. FIELD & Co. Loss estimated at $100,000, upon which there was an insurance of $80,000, as follows:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Market | $5,000 | Commercial | $5,000 |
| Howard | 5,000 | City of Hartford | 5,000 |
| Continental | 5 000 | Charter Oak, Hartford | 5,000 |

| Phœnix, Conn | 5,000 | | |

Messrs. FIELD & Co. were on the eve of removing their warehouse to No. 95 John-street, where in future they will transact business. The buildings Nos. 53, 55 and 57 were owned by Mr. WENDELL, and formed a part of the Wyman and Endicott estate. They were new, and each was valued at $30,000. An insurance of $45,000, in the following-named companies, had been made upon them:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Knickerbocher | $15 000 | Bowery | 8 000 |
| United States | 15,000 | National | 7,000 |
| Total | | | $45,000 |

No. 59.—The first floor was occupied by R. H. HAYDOCK & Co., wholesale druggists; estimated loss on stock, $20,000; said to be fully insured. In the four stories above the very extensive lithographing business of ENDICOTT & Co. was transacted. Their loss is said to be between $20,000 and $30,000. Upon their premises were a valuable lot of stones, part of which were owned by the Government of the United States. The building was worth $30,000—whether insured or not was not ascertained.

No. 69.—This building is at the corner of Gold-street. It sustained damage to the extent of $1,000. Messrs. NASON & DODGE, iron-pipe manufacturers and gas-fitters, did business on the first and second floors. Their stock was damaged by water to the amount of $10,000. They were insured in the following-named companies.

|---|---|---|---|
| Commercial | $5 000 | Washington | $5,000 |

The printing-office of HORACE S. TAYLOR was in the upper part of the building. Loss by water, $500.

No. 51.—A three-story building, the first floor of which was occupied by NICHOLAS DOLL as a tailor's shop. Loss, $3,000; insured for $2,000 in the St. Nicholas and Hamilton Insurance Companies. In the rear was the locksmith and machine-shop of DUNCAN, WEST & Co., who lost about $1,000 worth of stock. EBRSH & Co., perfumers, occupied the second and third floors; they sustained a loss of $2,000, said to be insured. The building was valued at $6,000.

No. 49.—The Station-house of the Second Precinct Police, damaged about $500. The rear extension of No. 47 was injured by a falling wall to the extent of about $500.

ON ANN-STREET.

No. 81.—Four-story brick building, occupied by BLACK, GRAMM & Co.; totally destroyed; valued at $10,000.

No. 79.—A brick building, occupied by Mr. MCFEE as a packing-box factory. Loss on stock, $3,000. The building belongs to the Wyndel estate; loss about $5,000.

No. 86.—The dwelling of JOHN NIVEN, a Second Precinct Policeman; a part of his furniture was saved; loss $500—uninsured. Mr. CLARK also lived in the building. He lost $600 worth of furniture, and was not insured. Mr. J. R. SIMONS, a manufacturing jeweler, also had his workshop here. He sustained a loss of $1,500 in stock, upon which an insurance of $1,000 in the North River Insurance Company had been made. The building was valued at $5,000.

No. 88.—A tenement-house occupied by a number of poor families, who lost all their furniture, worth in the aggregate $6,000, and upon which there was no insurance.

No. 90.—The "Harrison Shades," a porter-house kept by WM. J. HARRISON. Loss about $1,500. Insured in the Citizens' Company. A portion of the building was used as a billard table manufactory. Loss about $2,000; insured for $1,500 in the Artisans' Insurance Company. The building was owned by Mr. CUCKROFT, and was worth about $6,000.

No. 92.—The brick building at the corner of Gold-street, the basement of which was occupied by JOHN LEARY, dealer in rags and paper. Loss, $800. Insured in the Hamilton Company for $400. The upper part of the building was occupied for various business purposes. A loss of about $1,000 in stock was sustained. The structure itself was damaged to the extent of $6,000.

ON FULTON-STREET.

The rear part of building No. 83 Fulton-street was crushed in by a falling wall. ISAAC AYRES, manufacturer of scales, was the occupant. He lost about $200 worth of stock, upon which he had an insurance of $2,000 in the North River Company. $300 will cover the damage to the building.

No. 87 Fulton-street took fire in the rear several times, but was as often put out by the firemen. The first floor and basement were in the occupancy of EDWARD DAUCK, dealer in musical instruments. His stock was removed by the Insurance patrol. His loss in stock amounts to $2,000. He was insured for $23,500. G. A. PRINCE's melodeon depot was on the second floor. His stock was slightly damaged. KNIGHT & Co., printers, were also on the same floor; $200 will cover the damage their stock sustained. They were both insured. A. WEINGARTEN, a lithographer on the floor above, lost about $500, and was not insured. The building was damaged to the extent of $800, and was insured. The rear of building No. 85 Fulton-street was also injured; $200 will probably cover the damage.

The firemen labored at the ruins until a late hour in the afternoon, when an order was given for them to leave the ground, excepting only a sufficient force to play upon the still smoking ruins and prevent the fire from again breaking out. The steam fire-engines "Manhattan" and "Niagara" did effective service, notwithstanding it was a difficult matter to supply them with water. The fire would probably have ravaged the whole block had it not been for the efficiency of these machines.

Soon after the fire broke out, the members of Engine Company No. 5 had to desert their machine. Stationed in Ann-street, which is an exceedingly narrow thoroughfare, they were playing upon the fire when the doors of No. 79 were forced. This made the heat so intense that the firemen were obliged to abandon the engine. Efforts were subsequently made to get her out, but without success, and several lives were jeopardized in the endeavor, as the wall of the building fell and the heads of the firemen escaped the bricks but by a few inches. The engine now lies wrecked, and almost hidden by the superincumbent mass of bricks.

The bitter coldness of the day made the duties of the firemen and the Police very arduous. The long stretches of hose which lay in every direction for many blocks around the scene of the conflagration were encased in ice, and required constant watching to prevent them from bursting. The spray from the leaking hose, falling upon the coats of the men, congealed, and made the wearers present a very peculiar appearance, while pendant icicles from moustaches and beards, served to add to their general grotesqueness.

The firemen did not lack for creature comforts. The numerous bar-rooms and dining-saloons in the neighborhood must have been nearly depleted of their contents by nightfall. These refreshments were partaken of in the streets as well as in the houses.

Crowds of spectators visited the fire during the day. A strong police force, however, under the command of Deputy CARPENTER, preserved most excellent order, and prevented any encroachment of mere idlers within the lines.

The following dispatches were received by Mayor TIEMANN very soon after it was known in Philadelphia that a large fire was raging here:

PHILADELPHIA, Thursday, Dec. 29, 1859.

Hon. Daniel F. Tiemann, Mayor of the City of New-York:

I have just learned that a conflagration is now raging in your City. Can our Fire Department be of service? If so, telegraph immediately.

ALEXANDER HENRY, Mayor of Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA, Thursday, Dec

Hon. Fernando Wood, Mayor of the City of New York:

The Philadelphia Hose and Steam Engine Company is ready, and will come at your word.

C. TIERS MYERS.

PHILADELPHIA, Thursday, Dec. 29.

For the Mayor of New-York:

DEAR SIR: The Hope Hose Steam Engine is at your service, and can be ready at a moment's notice.

T. H. PETO.

To the above Mayor TIEMANN replied:

To the Mayor of Philadelphia:

Many thanks for your kind offer, but the fire is out.

DANIEL F. TIEMANN.

To the others he sent:

The fire is nearly subdued. Many thanks for your kind offer.

DANIEL F. TIEMANN.

Mr. WILLIAM H. GATZMER, the agent of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company was consulted by the Philadelphia companies, and he promptly offered to send on the engines and men either by a special train or by one of the regular lines.

FIRE IN VESEY-STREET.

About 7½ o'clock last evening a fire broke out on the upper floor of the four-story brick building No. 44 Vesey-street, occupied by CHARLES DAVIS and family, and as a manufactory of hoop skirts. The fire originated from some of the trimming used becoming ignited from the stove. Mr. DAVIS' loss is about $200—no insurance. The third floor was occupied by KOLB & SALMON, mantilla makers. Loss about $100; insured. ELBRICH & BROTHERS, cigar dealers, also occupied a room on the same floor. The damage to their stock was about $50. The first and second floors, together with the basement, is occupied by BASSETT & OWEN, commission merchants and dealers in paper, twine and cordage. Their loss is about $300, principally by water; insured for $18,000 in City Companies. The building is owned by a Mr. ALLISON. The damage to it was about $500, said to be insured.

Engine No. 6, while going down Chatham-street on its way to the fire, ran into a car, crushed through its side and broke the leg of one of the passengers.

ARTISTIC MATTERS.

Like business, fashion and music, the pictorial art in New-York has now attained the development of a double season. Once upon a time, and that not so very long ago that the least naturalized citizen among us may not recall it, we used to look for our apocalypse of art in the merry month of May. The painters came in with the preachers, the Academy of Design and the "Anniversaries" combining to mark the decadence of Winter with its gayeties—and gently smoothing the way of the "world" from the last social ecstacies of Easter, onward to the intense vivacity of Midsummer and the watering-places. If now and then a stray work of art befel us in the Autumn, the event made but a moment's ripple in the regular tide of theatricals, literature and dinner-parties. An infinitessimal number of connoisseurs would turn aside from Broadway to scan the accident with hollowed hands about their critic eyes; a few amateurs would lavish adjectives upon their open-mouthed friends at the Club anent the matter; and the inevitable rustling ladies in silk who always appear at every imaginable sort of daylight spectacle, would sweep into the show-room of SCHAUS or WILLIAMS & STEVENS or GOUPIL, do a little delight and a good deal of talk, and then, with half-a-dozen more or less enthusiastic obituaries in the corners of the newspapers, the phenomenon would fade away—be engraved by subscription, and forthwith forever forgotten.

All this we have changed and are changing. Art has taken a recognized rank among the great interests of the great City, and the establishment of one or two grand galleries of painting, permanently to open to the public, and worthy to be classed with the museums of the European capitals, has ceased to be a wild dream of the future, and will at no distant day, we doubt not, become a practical subject for practical speculation and action. Already we have a "Fall season" of pictures, and the "stranger within our gates" may even find himself somewhat embarrassed to-day by the variety of forms and the multiplicity of places in which the Spirit of Beauty appeals to his attention. We have with us, always, the treasures of several handsome private collections, which, so honorably to their owners, have been thrown open to general inspection during the last two years; and the ateliers of our resident artists, in which there is so much to be seen and studied; and two or three galleries, Mr. BEYAN's, the International, and Dusseldorf, which have Summered and Wintered us so long and so successfully; and the perpetual kaleidoscope of the print-shops, and the now regularly established exhibitions of French and English Art, which are to be reciprocated, as we are glad to learn, by a regular exhibition of American paintings in London.

We have made so much progress, indeed, that any really fine picture is quite as sure of attracing public attention by its own merits now as a new drama or a new novel. Witness the brilliant reception of Mr. CHURCH's "Heart of the Andes," now astonishing the Athenians of New-England, and Mr. PAGE's "Venus," now exciting the staid Philadelphians; and Mr. WHITE's historical painting of "Washington Resigning his Commission at Annapolis," painted for the State of Maryland, and admired here on its way to its destination, at Mr. PARKER's Rooms, No. 768 Broadway.

Still another American artist is now "speaking his mind" at the same place, Mr. GEORGE L. BROWN, who after twenty years' residence in Italy has brought the sky of the Apennines and the spirit of the Campagna back with him to his native land. It is a curious thing to pass from Broadway into the presence of Mr. BROWN's Italian Gallery. You leave the clear crisp American atmosphere to find yourself, in a moment, gazing with the artist into the hazy, dreamy vistas of the Italian air. Mr. BROWN's chief technical merit is his marvellous mastery of details, which he pursues with the untiring affection of a mediæval German sculptor; but he has a genuine feeling, too, for distance and atmospheric effect, and a ripe, vigorous sense of color. His pencil drawings are simply amazing in point of patient fidelity. If he were an animated photographic machine he could hardly be more impartially minute in his study and treatment of rocks and foliage. The amateurs of a bolder and more imaginative art will find things worth noting too at these rooms of Mr. PARKER, particularly in a most brilliant and truthful sunset picture by Mr. GEORGE INNESS, of whose masterly powers as a colorist we have had no adequate previous expression. The simplicity and (though we detest the much-abused word) the earnestness of this composition cannot be too highly praised. A still, smooth stream goes winding through the rich levels of a meadow-land; the waters and the land, the tranquil clump of trees which intercepts the immediate splendor of the sun; the brooding atmosphere, are all transfigured with a glory of light not more intense than soft. Overhead, range above range, the multitudinous cloudlets glow with a thousand shades and tones of the one dominant purpling color of the hour. To feel the full truth and power of this rare painting, one needs to know the river scenery of New-England and New-York by heart. Those by whom that rich chapter in the book of Nature has not yet been learned, may learn from this transcript how much they have still to enjoy.

But our native artists have not the whole field to themselves. At the rooms of Mr. HARDINGE, No. 12 in the University Building, a rare collection of late works from the best easels of France and England is displayed with a skilful coquetry of draperies and upholstery which abundantly argues the artistic knowledge of the possessor. Mr. HARDINGE's name is familiar to all the picture-buyers of America as an indefatigable snapper-up of by no means "unconsidered trifles" in all the ateliers of London and Paris. He has with him now decidedly the finest Gainsborough ever seen on this side of the water. The "Woodcutter's Daughter" is a master-piece of modeling and treatment. It is full of "mannerism," but of the mannerism of a really great painter; and it breathes the very spirit of evening in a rural English scene. It is indeed an idyl, as complete in its way as the most picturesque verses of GRAY's Elegy, and it would be hard to find a better illustration of English art as our fathers understood and felt it half a century ago.

English landscape is well represented too at Mr. HARDING's rooms; one of his Coopers especially deserving and rewarding attention. A miraculous man-at-arms by MEISSONNIER, some charming little cabinet histories of domestic life and feeling by FREBE and GUILLEMIN; a sketch, full of Theckla-like feeling, by ARY SCHEFFER; a very powerful dramatic picture, painted with a firm and nervous brush, by STEVENS; an allegorical female figure by HAYS, wonderful for vigor of design, truth of flesh-tints and "weird wickedness" of expression; and several "bits of nature" from the fertile pencil of TROYON, are but some of the attractions of this most agreeable little morning lounge.

THURSDAY, Dec. 29—P. M.

The Secretary of the Treasury has notified an award of 75 ℔ cent., instead of 50 ℔ cent., to the New-York bidders for the 6 ℔ cent. Treasury Bills. The notice comes unexpectedly and without explanation, and if no other bids have been thrown out for informality or other cause, the total awards would seem to be about $4,500,000, instead of $3,000,000. That the Secretary will soon require all of this, is quite probable, and he may have deemed it mutually agreeable to avail of the offers opened on Tuesday to increase the issue at once and to the parties who then bid for more than the basis of three millions would have given them. We presume that if the arrangement is not agreeable, the Secretary or the Sub-Treasurer in this City will have little difficulty in placing a corresponding sum to the amount objected to by private negotiation at the same rate of interest, as they have done before soon after a public award.

The call for Money to-day among the Brokers shows a good degree of activity at 6 ℔ cent., and in some instances 7 ℔ cent. is paid on miscellaneous collateral. The Treasury bill negotiation temporarily increases the demand, though we understand the Department is in no want of the money this week, nor likely to be pressing for it next week, in the absence of the organization of the House of Representatives. Discounts continue quiet outside of Bank, most of the prime paper offered by regular dealers being taken at Bank. The Foreign Exchanges are unusually dull this week, and the disposition appears to be general to throw the remittances over New-Year's day. Standard bills on London, 109⅜@½; Paris, f.5.17½; Southern bills on England, 109@109¼; France, f.5.20@f.5.18¾. These terms are called almost nominal by some of the Brokers, the dullness of demand being very marked. The letters by the Arago speak of an easy and confident state of things in the London Money Market, and the coming year is looked to as one promising general trade prosperity and political quiet. The price of Money is 2½ ℔ cent. In American Stocks there was some business doing in New-York Central 7 ℔ cents., and in Erie Shares, the latter $14. The Scrip shares of the Illinois Central had receded to 60@58 ℔ cent. The following is the latest report from the London Stock Exchange:

The bills of the old Bank of New-York of the denomination of $2 have been counterfeited by the photographic process, and the counterfeits put into circulation. In the absence of the genuine bill to compare with, they are well calculated to deceive particularly in the signatures. The coloring on the face of the bill is poorly executed and the paper of inferior quality.

The Stock Market manifests a considerable degree of firmness, considering the eagerness shown by the operators for the fall in New-York Central and some other of the Railway Shares to put out heavy contracts ahead. The same party were disposed to-day to use the temporary turn to activity in the Money Market, against a rise in prices. But the demand, nevertheless, at the Second Board was good and at steady prices, the buyers paying a more liberal difference than usual of late for options 30@60 days. The sales of New-York Central were 7,000 or 8,000 Shares, opening 75⅛, and closing 75⅞@¼ cash, and ⅛@¼ buyer 30@60 days. The prices of Galena and Rock Island at the close yesterday were maintained, with a moderate business in each. There was a further advance in Reading to 42 ℔ cent., cash, and 42¼ ℔ cent. buyer 60 days, the orders to buy being principally from Philadelphia. The other Coal shares rather dull. Panama fell off to 127½@¾; Pacific Mail neglected by speculation, only a few shares offered or bid for at 76½ ℔ cent. Erie shares $8 75; the Second Mortgages, 92; Convertibles, 29 ℔ cent. The additional assents to the new organization of the Company inscribed to-day equal $700,000 or $800,000. Two more business days remain to complete the subscription. Michigan Central 8 ℔ cents. advanced to 90 ℔ cent. Illinois Central Construction Bonds ¼ ℔ cent. l
